SENATE—Monday, February 8, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, January 25, 1982)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Oh give thanks to the Lord, call upon His name; make known His deeds among the peoples. Sing to Him, sing praises to Him; speak of all His wonders. Glory in His holy name; let the heart of those who seek the Lord be glad. Seek the Lord and His strength; seek His face continually. Remember His wonders which He has done, His marvels, and the judgements uttered by His mouth.—Psalm 105: 5 N.A.S.

Gracious Lord God, let Thy glory be manifest in this place. Let Thy holy presence be felt in all the offices. Let Thy love infuse the heart of every person who works here so that each of us will love the others and be loved by them. Dispel all that is evil from our hearts. Let there be nothing in us that would grieve the holy spirit or offend a sister or brother.

Grant forgiveness to those who are burdened with guilt, assurance to those who are discouraged, comfort to those who hurt, patience to those who are lonely, strength to those who are weary, healing to those who are ill, hope to those who despair, joy to those who sorrow, wisdom to those who are confused, light to those who have lost their way. In the name of Him who is the way, the truth, and the life, we pray. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished minority leader if he has some use for the leader's time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished acting majority leader.

I do not believe I need any of the time that the acting leader is offering. I will take just a small portion of my own time. I want to refer to the nomination of Powell Moore to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

NOMINATION OF POWELL A. MOORE TO BE AN ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on February 4, the full Senate approved the nomination of Powell A. Moore to be Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations. I cannot think of a better person than Powell Moore to fill this important position, and I look forward to working with him in his new capacity.

Mr. Moore has had a long and distinguished record of public service in Washington. He served as press secretary to the late Senator Richard Russell of Georgia from 1966 until 1971. He served as Deputy Director of Public Information for the Department of Justice from 1971 until 1972. He served as Deputy Special Assistant to the President from 1973 until 1975. With the election of Ronald Reagan as our 40th President, Mr. Powell Moore assumed responsibilities as Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs.

Mr. President, I have known Powell Moore for a number of years. He is a person of impeccable integrity and devotion to duty. He is one of the finest gentlemen I have had the privilege of knowing.

His experience in working with the Senate has served him well in his numerous positions with the executive branch. He is sensitive to, and appreciative of, Congress as an institution. As a result, he is particularly effective in working with Congress.

He has a difficult job ahead of him. However, I am confident that he is equal to the task. I commend the administration for choosing Powell Moore to assume this critical position. I certainly will do everything I can to cooperate and work with him, and I wish him the very best as he launches into his new responsibilities.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

ABRAHAM LINCOLN WALKS AT MIDNIGHT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, this coming Friday, February 12, marks the 173d anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, our country's first Republican President. Vachel Lindsay lends poetic thoughts on this historic figure in "Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight," and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN WALKS AT MIDNIGHT

(By Vachel Lindsay)

It is portentous, and a thing of state
That here at midnight, in our little town
A mourning figure walks, and will not rest,
Near the old court-house pacing up and down,

Or by his homestead, or in shadowed yards
He lingers where his children used to play,
Or through the market, on the well-worn stones
He stalks until the dawn-stars burn away.

A bronzed, lank man! His suit of ancient black,
A famous high top-hat and plain worn shawl
Make him the quaint great figure that men love,
The prairie-lawyer, master of us all.

He cannot sleep upon his hillside now.
He is among us:—as in times before!
And we who toss and lie awake for long
Breathe deep, and start, to see him pass the door.

His head is bowed. He thinks on men and kings.
Yea, when the sick world cries, how can he sleep?
Too many peasants fight, they know not why,
Too many homesteads in black terror weep.

The sins of all the war-lords burn his heart.
He sees the dreadnaughts scouring every main.
He carries on his shawl-wrapped shoulders now
The bitterness, the folly and the pain.

He cannot rest until a spirit-dawn
Shall come;—the shining hope of Europe free:
The league of sober folk, the Workers' Earth,
Bringing long peace to Cornland, Alp and Sea.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

It breaks his heart that kings must murder still,
That all his hours of travail here for men
Seem yet in vain. And who will bring white peace
That he may sleep upon his hill again?

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the leader's time.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

HOW LONG BEFORE WE ACT ON GENOCIDE?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a brief article in the January 30 issue of the Washington Post described the reunion of a sister and brother originally separated while at the Nazi concentration camp Auschwitz in the early years of World War II.

For the past 39 years, each thought the other to have died at Auschwitz. Upon a recent visit to Israel, the sister was informed that her cousin had received a postcard from her brother after the war "which mentioned something about Newcastle." The telephone directory provided the sister with her brother's address.

For this sister and brother, there are countless others never again to be reunited, victims of genocide. This is the case for sisters and brothers separated not only by the Holocaust, but by Idi Amin in Uganda, by Turkey in Armenia, and Pol Pot in Cambodia.

These are all too real examples of genocide in the 20th century.

How long will we wait before acting against this terrible crime of genocide? How long will the International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide remain unratified by the U.S. Senate?

It has been pending before the Senate since 1949, when President Truman first submitted it for ratification. Over the past 33 years, every administration, both Republican and Democratic, has supported the treaty. It has been signed and ratified by 85 nations, reflecting the consensus in the world community that genocide is, indeed, an international crime.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to exceed 30 minutes with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DR. ERWIN A. FRANCE—MAN OF THE YEAR

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, on February 23, Dr. Erwin A. France, a most distinguished citizen of the State of Illinois, will be honored as 1982 Man of the Year by the March of Dimes Metropolitan Chicago Chapter.

Dr. France has compiled an admirable and remarkable record of accomplishment during a public career of more than 20 years.

In the field of government, Dr. France has served most capably as deputy chief of the Illinois Employment Service, as director of the city of Chicago's youth opportunity program, as director of the city's model cities program, and as administrative assistant to the late Mayor Richard J. Daley.

In the private sector, he is executive vice president of Palmer, Green & King, Ltd., a nationally known consulting and development firm.

His Man of the Year status, however, derives from an additional, selfless undertaking to which Dr. France has devoted so much of his time in recent years.

Mr. President, the value of Erwin France's years of service to Chicago area children through his work for the prevention and treatment of birth defects simply cannot be calculated.

He has served on the March of Dimes National Board of Directors, as well as on the executive committee of the Metropolitan Chicago chapter.

He is a member of the National Task Force on Perinatal Health Care in the High Risk Community, which seeks to provide critically needed service programs for babies before and after delivery, and for pregnant women.

The work of Dr. France and this group has been significant in improving the outcome of pregnancy, for both mother and baby, in disadvantaged communities, and in working toward reducing the tragic rate of infant mortality in some of those communities.

In short, Erwin A. France is an extraordinary man who has made an extraordinary contribution to us all.

His friends and admirers will gather on February 23 to affirm that fact. I affirm it now, and commend to my colleagues the splendid accomplishments of Dr. Erwin A. France.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL AERONAUTIC ASSOCIATION

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, recently the president of the National Aeronautic Association, Gen. Clifton von Kann, discussed the many problems of the U.S. Establishment in a yearend report. He also discussed and presented a first draft for a national aerospace policy to a news conference on December 30, 1981. General von Kann's proposal for a national aeronautic policy was developed as a result of Aerospace I, the National Aeronautic Association's symposium on aerospace issues held at Williamsburg, Va., last summer.

General von Kann's statement to the press conference and his draft of a national aerospace policy are both very important, not only to the future of every aspect of aviation, but to our space endeavors as well. Our Nation has long been a leader in aerospace and it is vital that we continue that leadership. It is not only a matter of national pride, but it is a matter of consequence to our economy and added distinct contributions to our national security.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the comments of General von Kann at his yearend press briefing as well as the first draft of a national aerospace policy for the United States be printed in the RECORD. I urge my colleagues to carefully study this aggressive and sensible beginning to a national aerospace policy.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF CLIFTON F. VON KANN

Gentlemen: The purpose of this briefing is to report in general on NAA's 1981 efforts, and more specifically on the results of AEROSPACE I, NAA's symposium on air and space issues held at Williamsburg, Virginia last summer.

AEROSPACE I was conducted because of our deep concern about the erosion of the United States' former predominance in air and space—and what this implies for our national security, our economic growth and our technological vitality.

The year end situation in virtually every aspect of aviation and space endeavor makes it all too clear that our concerns were valid—and that the alarm which we had voiced on the platform, in public statements and in letters to the Congress and the President was, if anything, an understatement. Let me offer a few examples why.

Space is the new frontier commercially, militarily and scientifically. Yet, despite our success with the Space Shuttle, we have no national space policy worthy of the name, we have no coherent space organization and we are uncertain of our objectives in space. By contrast, the Soviets are moving into space with a steady, well funded program which has given them a permanent manned presence in space and the prospect of additional triumphs. Even our allies are surpassing us in commercial space applications.

We recognize that an effort to frame a national space policy is underway in the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy. The test of this policy will be whether it spells out long range objectives or reflects OMB's short term economic concerns.

In the meantime the future of NASA—a vital national resource—is being debated, including the possible shift of the aeronautical R&D program to some other agency. Virtually all our superiority in military and civil aircraft has resulted from aeronautical technology which was spawned in NACA, and later NASA. The current agency of NASA raises the grim specter of technological disarmament—something we could not possibly have imagined a year ago.

You know what is happening to the airlines. What no one knows is where it will end. But there can be no argument about the dampening effect which cancelled orders for new airline aircraft will have on U.S. aircraft manufacturers. Buoyed up by substantial airline orders, our aerospace industry in the past took aggressive production decisions and seized more than 90% of the world market for transport aircraft. Now competition from abroad is rising, airline orders are falling, and another vital national asset is threatened. General aviation exports are also in difficulty—although for different reasons. Meanwhile, the Export-Import Bank is forced to struggle to support U.S. aircraft exports.

Of equal concern is that fact that private flying, as we have known it, is being priced out of the market. Yet if Americans cannot learn the love of flying at the grass roots, where will our future pilots, engineers and mechanics come from? We must hope that aero-modelling and home building of aircraft can fill the growing void.

No list of major aviation problems would be complete without the airport and airway capacity situation. In the 1960's it became evident that Congress would not provide continuity of funding for airport and airway facilities on a year to year basis. The Act of 1970 provided a mechanism for maintaining a steady level of investment in these facilities; and even with some flaws in implementation the program worked reasonably well throughout the 1970's. However, the program has now expired with the Act and can't be revived—not because it isn't essential to our aviation leadership, but because the two houses of Congress and the Administration can't agree on how to improve it. Meanwhile, administrator Helms has properly recognized system capacity as the key aviation problem of the 1980's.

These are but a few examples. No matter where we turn in aviation and space, there are problems galore and unresolved issues.

And this is why we held AEROSPACE I—to examine the problems, to see what issues national policy should address, and to consider how such a policy might be implemented.

The work of our six workshops, as well as the wise words of distinguished panelist and speakers, began to give us answers to some of our questions. These will be found in the proceedings of AEROSPACE I, which will be published shortly. In the meantime, NAA has prepared the first draft of a National Aerospace Policy, which we believe must be the first step toward repairing the bad situation in which our aerospace establishment finds itself.

Let me emphasize that this is a first draft, and a rough draft at that. It has not yet been fully coordinated with those who participated in AEROSPACE I. And while I have discussed it with various aviation leaders and interested members of government, there just hasn't been opportunity for the full exchange which must in time take place.

Nevertheless, we believe the problems and difficulties of the aerospace establishment are so real and so fraught with national danger that we are placing the draft statement in the public arena so that debate and discussion may be expedited.

Now, you will quickly see that the statement is quite general. It is not a budget document, but a summary of major goals and principles. There is no alternative to this approach. What we need first of all is a statement which the entire aviation community can support. If the various aviation organizations could have agreed on more issues in the past, we might not be in the present plight.

The second urgent need is a policy declaration that aerospace is vital to our national security and our economic growth—and that it deserves better treatment than the benign neglect or outright mismanagement which has occurred in many past actions of the government.

If this policy statement, or some such policy statement, can meet these two needs, it will be well worth while and will serve as the platform for future constructive action.

You are probably wondering now what we mean by constructive action—or how do we get down to the specifics of timing and funding. In our view the next major need is to create a mechanism for dealing with these specific problems and issues—and they are complex ones at that. The issues affecting aerospace involve national security, technology, international trade, economic development, foreign policy and many others. There is no cabinet council that is organized to cover such an array of subjects.

And even if there were, it would still not be the right answer. What is needed—and what has worked when it has been tried both here and abroad—is a forum in which the leaders of the industrial, scientific and financial communities can meet with the appropriate government ministers and seek solutions to problems on the basis of the good of the country rather than the more parochial considerations. We are thinking of some arrangement such as the Air League in the U.K., or the Air Coordinating Committee which held forth here from World War II until the late 1950's. With a mechanism of this type, we believe that better solutions to the specific problems will be found—certainly better than those produced by attacking the problems without a policy, a goal or a mechanism, as we have been doing.

To conclude, let me say that NAA's aims for 1982 will be to improve the policy statement and to stimulate the creation of the coordinating mechanism which is needed so badly.

I thank you for your attention and will now try to answer your questions.

A NATIONAL AEROSPACE POLICY FOR THE UNITED STATES—FIRST DRAFT OCTOBER 29, 1981

Given: That aerospace is a vital element of U.S. national power—the key to our national defense and essential to our economic strength and development.

That as the world moves into space, the high ground of the future, the U.S. must establish and maintain the capability to neutralize hostile military actions in space.

That space offers untold opportunities for future economic development.

That U.S. national security demands a strong defense industry with an early surge capability.

That the high quality of U.S. aerospace products, along with new aircraft orders by U.S. air carriers, has brought about U.S. domination of the world market in civil aircraft and has produced large and essential export balances for many years.

That the national air transport system, including airports and airways, is critical to interstate commerce.

That aerospace products and air rights are significant factors in international negotiations.

That the international air transport system brings the people of the world closer together in peaceful relationships.

Given, However: That, the continuing Soviet arms buildup increases the threat to our national security.

That U.S. leadership in air space is under unprecedented challenges by friend and foe.

That the Soviet space program is better supported than that of the U.S., and that the Soviets have virtually established a permanent manned presence in space.

That there is inadequate support for U.S. exploration of outer space and the universe.

That the NASA/industry/science team is not receiving the resources needed to insure U.S. technological leadership in aeronautics or space science.

That the U.S. defense industrial base can no longer support mobilization plans in the event of emergency.

That the U.S. system for command, control, communications, and intelligence needs to be improved, modernized and made survivable.

That the U.S. strategic bomber force is rapidly becoming obsolete.

That the U.S. ICBM force is becoming more vulnerable to Soviet attack.

That U.S. strategic airlift capabilities continue to be inadequate.

That the air superiority formerly provided by U.S. tactical aircraft is no longer assured, and the development cycle for new aircraft takes too long.

That the development of adequate airport and airway system capacity has been impeded by prolonged disagreements on allocation of system costs and the public benefits derived from the system.

That the future of the air transport system is threatened by piecemeal and inconsistent noise abatement regulations at the local level.

That the ability of the U.S. airlines to purchase new aircraft is threatened by high fuel costs and excessive competition in a deregulated environment.

That the plight of airlines, along with growing resistance to the export of U.S. aerospace products in world markets, threatens the health and vitality of the U.S. aerospace industry.

That the emphasis of U.S. authorities on low prices in international air transportation has undermined the economic viability of the international air transport system.

That U.S. customs, immigration and border crossing requirements and practices have detracted from the ability of international aviation to promote peace through international travel.

That the human resources needed to maintain U.S. leadership are failing to materialize, as evidenced by a falling off in the production of U.S. aeronautical scientists, engineers and technicians. Similarly, the interest of young Americans in aeronautics and space flight is being suppressed by the growing costs of entering the world of flight.

That the U.S. government has no effective mechanism for dealing with these issues or coordinating the many facets of aerospace from the viewpoints of national security, technology, international trade, diplomacy and economics.

That the responsibilities for space related functions are scattered among many agencies in the U.S. government with no overall coordinating machinery.

It Is Therefore the Policy of the United States: That continued leadership in air and space is vital to U.S. national security and economic growth.

That this leadership—based on technological excellence, airline prosperity and the preeminence of the U.S. aerospace industry—is a vital national asset.

That any developments which threaten U.S. leadership will be considered a threat to the security of the U.S.

That it is a national goal to establish and maintain organization, policies and programs that will assure continuation of U.S. aerospace leadership.

SPACE

That since the nation's first line of defense will ultimately be in space, the U.S. must expedite programs that lead to the establishment of space related defense systems.

That improved functioning and survivability of command, control, communications and intelligence systems in space must be given high priority.

That commercial exploitation of space is now technologically feasible and must be expedited through innovative cooperation arrangements between government and industry.

That plans for U.S. space stations be given higher priority.

That U.S. exploration of outer space—the newest frontier—must be sustained.

That a focal point in the U.S. government for overseeing space related programs must be established.

MILITARY AIRPOWER

That the U.S. strategic bomber force and land based strategic missile force must be modernized to preserve the effectiveness of the Triad concept.

That U.S. strategic airlift capabilities must be increased to a point where they can support required deployments.

That the U.S. tactical military aircraft inventory must be brought to quantity and quality levels sufficient to prevail against expected threats.

That the development cycle for new aircraft must be reduced in time.

That additional efforts must be undertaken to ensure that the military services are provided with adquate numbers of dedicated and qualified people—by the draft, if necessary.

THE DEFENSE INDUSTRY BASE

That the defense industry base must be strengthened to a point where it can support mobilization plans. Particular attention must be given to manufacturing research and development and other programs to enhance productivity. Greater stability in the defense related marketplace must also be emphasized.

TECHNOLOGY

That the government, the defense industry and scientific community must maintain and strengthen the teamwork which has brought about U.S. aerospace leadership in the past and which is needed to provide the technology with which the U.S. aerospace industry can produce superior civil and military aircraft, spacecraft, and space facilities.

That the criteria for government funding of aeronautical research and development in the intermediate phase between pure research and commercial application must be: (1) whether the program will benefit the Nation; (2) whether the technology involved is necessary to maintain U.S. preeminence in that particular area; and (3) whether the program can or cannot be funded as a normal business risk by the private sector.

That technology transfer must be limited to situations where the transfer will not impair U.S. interests.

CIVIL AVIATION

That, under private operation, the national air transport system must: (1) provide the public with safe, efficient and economical air transportation; (2) contribute to the economic growth of the Nation; and (3) generate earnings that attract capital, provide job opportunities, and facilitate the acquisition on new technology aircraft.

That the U.S. airport and airway infrastructure must be the most safe and efficient in the world—supported by public and private funds on realistic assessment of the public benefit derived.

That the U.S. airport and airway infrastructure must provide adequate capacity to meet public demand with particular attention given to new air traffic control technology and more ample reliever airports and heliports.

That the U.S. government must take appropriate action to prevent the crippling of the national air transport system by piecemeal and inconsistent noise regulation at the local level.

That a vigorous general aviation establishment is in the national interest.

INTERNATIONAL AVIATION

That continuation of the favorable trade balance in aerospace products is in the national interest.

That the Agreement on Trade in Civil Aircraft must be enforced.

That the U.S. international air transport industry must: (1) contribute to U.S. national objectives in defense and security, foreign policy and international commerce; and (2) be safe, efficient and economically viable so that it can generate earnings that attract capital and provide job opportunities.

That discrimination against U.S. manufacturers in the world aerospace market and U.S. flag carriers in international air commerce is adverse to the national interest. This policy objective must be achieved by bilateral and multilateral negotiations with the nations concerned.

That international transportation of people, mail and goods must be offered at economically justifiable prices.

That U.S. customs, immigration and border crossing requirements and practices at U.S. international airports must be modernized and simplified to retain the benefits and public convenience of high technology air transportation and to facilitate international travel.

HUMAN RESOURCES

That adequate numbers of pilots and trained aeronautical technical personnel is a national necessity.

That young Americans must be encouraged to build, maintain and fly aircraft and spacecraft.

COORDINATION OF AEROSPACE ISSUES

That improved machinery must be created for coordinating aviation and space programs, national security requirements, supporting technology needs, economic objectives, foreign trade considerations, and international aviation policies. This machinery must bring together both civil and government leaders in a joint effort to insure that the U.S. aerospace establishment best serves the national interest.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Chair if it would be proper for me to address a few remarks relative to the televising of the Senate. Would that be in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the present time, the Senate is conducting morning business. If the Senator from Arizona desires to be recognized, the Chair will recognize him for any purpose he desires.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Chair.

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I know that the majority leader, a man for whom I have great respect and a great feeling of friendship, is most anxious to see the proceedings of the Senate televised. Mr. President, I have to oppose that.

I can recall very vividly the experience we went through in this Chamber when we were debating the Panama Canal giveaway. I recall Members of this body—one in particular—who made a 6-hour speech. I never heard him make over a 20- or 30-minute speech in my life before. There was only one reason for that—he got on radio.

Now, I will tell you only the Lord knows what will happen in this Chamber when that red light goes on. I can see speeches going on all day, and we do not say too much as it is and the longer we speak the less we say. I would be very fearful, frankly, that what work we do accomplish in this body would diminish. It might even disappear, particularly when we have one-third of our body running for reelection. There is no better way of getting to the public, of course, than through television. And there is no better way to impress the folks back home that you are just working your head off than standing here on the floor and orating at great length while the light shines red.

I hope, Mr. President, that our leader will not go through with this proposal. I think the great strength of this body is our ability to speak. I do not think it is going to be stregthened by having an artificial stimulation of television. I do not think the quality of gur remarks will improve. A do not think the quality of our legislatien will improve. And I can see someof these emotional issues, such as if we had television with busing in here, we would have been busing around here for the next year. And when we get up to something like abortion—"Sadie lock the door." Thiat is goint to be a hard one to shut up.

I am going to say more on this when the time comes, But I just wanted my leader, The Senator from Tennessee to know that he cannot count on me even though I am chairman of the Communications Subcommittee. And of course, I wqill use every power I have in that little job to see to it that television stays on the Johnny Carsons and the other performance that bring us real entertainment and not depend upon the U.S. Senate, the 100 dedicated men and women, who, frankly, would do much better just being alone in here. I thank the Chair.

Mr, LONG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I refer to some figures the majority leader put in the RECORD to indicate that the first year the House was on television, which was the first year of this Congress, that the House was in session less hours than the House was in session the previous session, which was the last session of the previous Congress. I have discussed that matter with House Members who told me that that is a very meaningless comparison. They said the proper comparison would be how much time did it take to pass a given number of substantive bills. In other words in the first session of last year, the House passed far fewer bills than they passed in the last year before the House televised its prceedings. The average amount of time taken on a bill was more than an hour longer.

But even that tis not a meaningful comparison for the Senate, may I say to the Senator, because the House has a Rules Committee that fixes in advance the amount of time the House can speak to something. The meaningful comparison would be to compare the amount of time spent on these little 1-minute statements where people make a brief statement and put an insertion in the RECORD, and then they—not all, but some Members—learn to tape it and send that to TV stations in their area. And for that type of conversation, it has more than doubled. And that is with the thing just getting started and a great number of Congressmen not being adjusted to it and not organized to use it with the committee backbone to pay to put it on the air.

In due time, one would think it could quadruple. Certainly it could quadruple here in the U.S. Senate. And the Senator well knows we were not able to get our job done the way it is now. So we have a real problem there.

Furthermore, I would like to ask the Senator, as one who can be an expert on this subject, what problems can it pose to us when Members of this body, for whatever reason, decide they would like to be considered as candidates for the Presidency? The Senator did not use the Senate as his platform or his podium to project his candidacy for the Presidency when he made a very fine campaign, in the finest tradition of the Nation, for the President of the United States.

But I would ask the Senator, are there not Members of this body who nurture the hope that they might be President of the United States some day?

Now, may I say I have studied it and thought about it. I just counted up the list of Senators who have either given some suggestion or appointed a committee or made some arrangements for people to explore the possibility of a Presidential candidacy on behalf of such Senators. And I have gone through and checked off the list of Senators who I think either have the potential to be President some day or who I have reason to believe that they think they have the potential to be President some day, and it adds up to at least 61 Senators in this body.

Of course, a man does not have to declare himself a candidate for the President of the United States in order to think about it. One can have it in mind without ever making it a matter of public knowledge, for reasons of propriety or for whatever reasons.

Can the Senator see the potential Presidential candidates holding this floor day in and day out to advance their candidacy for the President of the United States?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Certainly; although I would not say that is my principal objection. If we had television on the floor in 1964, I would have probably lost more. But, that is beside the point.

I can refer the Senator to the advent of television in our committee rooms. We used to hold very fine hearings in Armed Services, for example, a very complicated field, in a small room. Oh, no more. You have to have it in a big room; you have to have television. I have never seen it on television, but we have to have it on television.

And the Senator himself knows from his own committee experience that whenever that light lights up and the camera is on you or me or anyone else, the opportunity to go nationwide is kind of hard to resist.

I would not even guess if there is anybody in this Chamber that is thinking of being President, although I will have to say there would be something unnatural about him if he was not or did not at some time. I think we all dream, and sometimes in the middle of the night those thoughts come to us. And the middle of the night would be a good time to have a television camera right at the foot of your bed and just turn it on and make your speech. There are three speeches we make. We write one out meticulously, we deliver it, and then the best speech is the one we make when we go to bed. So that is where you ought to have the television camera, not here where we make our worst speech.

I think the Senator is absolutely right. Getting back to the Senator's original question, the House has control. They have the Rules Committee and they have the 2-minute rule. Over here we have unlimited debate. And it will be more than unlimited with that machine going.

I would really hope that the majority leader would not push this matter. I do not think his father-in-law would ever have liked it. As beautifully as he spoke, as one who served with him, he did not wish us to stand up and speak the English language as he spoke it. I think he would be the first to say, "I only want my colleagues to hear this."

Mr. BURDICK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. BURDICK. When the red light comes on, what happens to the committee participation?

Mr. GOLDWATER. If it comes on in here, everyone will have to be in here or the television cameras will show a whole lot of empty seats. When it gets back home, they will say, "Where is that Senator we elected? He is supposed to be there."

The folks back home do not realize that all of the work is done in the committees. This Chamber is sort of a showplace. I would hate to have that red light be a signal to vacate this Chamber. We have enough signals now to vacate the Chamber.

There are now three of us on the floor. I imagine something is going to happen today sometime, but if this were being televised there would be 97

Senators catching hell at home for not being here.

That is another good reason to oppose it.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Surely.

Mr. LONG. Speaking of the experiences in committee, does the Senator observe what this Senator notices, that when they put proceedings on television and when the camera comes on the Senator and he is there before the camera on television, and here is a prominent witness—I do not care whether he is a general in the Army or someone who testifies about Watergate or whatever—when the camera comes on the Senator, he cannot sit there and say, "No questions."

People will say, "What about my Senator? Others had a lot of intelligent questions to ask, but he just sits there like a bump on a log."

You have to ask intelligent questions. We have been through this for awhile. We still have not lived through the stage where people ask questions, just because the TV camera is on them.

May I say to the Senator that when the Senator from Louisiana was there in a committee doing the work of a Senator, getting the evidence, sometimes the Senator from Louisiana was the only one sitting there, not just on one committee but on other committees, doing his duty, sitting there when others have left, asking questions that should be asked.

I have done this and I am sure the Senator has done it, to submit a whole list of questions, saying, "Here are the questions. Will you provide the answers to the questions?"

The witness will usually do so and it ordinarily is adequate. If not, you can call him back and get further information.

But that sort of thing does not happen on television now. People do not submit questions on television but they ask them. Is that not correct?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct. And they do not care how long it takes or how right the questions are or how material they are to the subject being discussed. I think it would be much, much more kind of the witnesses from the Pentagon, who spend far too much time over here explaining things to us than I think they should.

I just repeat, Mr. President, that I hope this idea comes to a no good end. Turn the light off.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. May I refer the Senator to the RECORD I hold in my hand as a point of illustration. Here is where Mr. RIEGLE took the floor and there is a bullet, a black mark alongside his name, a round, black mark which we call a bullet for the RECORD. The subject is "Detroit District Recruiting Command."

We all look at that bullet and we know Mr. RIEGLE was not on the floor at the time. He just sent that on in and asked that it be in the RECORD. He did not make the speech. He just put it into the RECORD. He did not consume any of the Senate's time. We are able to get on with the business.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will yield, I just did it. I had a nice three-page statement. I could have read it but it would have been a waste of the time of the Senate so I used the procedure of reading one or two words and asked unanimous consent that the remainder be printed as if read. I do not like that either, I might say.

Mr. LONG. But here the people in Detroit will say, "Why didn't he say that? He just put it into the RECORD."

In other words, Senators would have to make these statements, to stand there and read them. Better yet, it would make a better impression on the people back home if you spent some time rehearsing it, standing up here and saying it with great flair.

Then people back home would say, "Didn't Senator RIEGLE make a great speech about the Detroit District Recruiting Command?"

So when it goes on television, you want to give them a good impression.

Let me ask the Senator a further question. Can the Senator explain why we want to show ourselves at our worst on television? I thought if you are going to be on television, you would put on a blue shirt, put on some TV makeup, make yourself look real pretty and look like a million dollars. Everyone would try to present himself to look good.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will yield, there is the problem that we have to have our hair fluffed, we have to have our wife, if we have our wife around, tell us what tie we should wear.

Nothing makes me madder than my wife telling me what tie to wear. And whether to wear a white shirt or blue shirt because it depends on the lights. You have to shine your shoes.

No, I do not like that. I like to come on as I am, as terrible as that is. I do not want to spend 3 hours every morning getting prettied up.

Mr. LONG. Do we not also have a problem of presenting something that does not make a good appearance on television and then explain it? Why present a picture during a quorum call of all the empty desks and have to keep explaining it? For all we know, people on television would think we are not telling the truth or exaggerating it or misleading them. Why should we have to explain something that would serve no point in being put on television to begin with?

Anyone who is interested in the work of the Senate and can spend some time in connection with it knows that many times during quorum calls or while we are waiting for someone to come to the Chamber, or waiting for a committee to report a bill, very few people are on the floor. Someone would like to make a speech so we put a quorum call on while he is on his way over. Why explain that? People reluctant to believe it would say, "They want to make themselves look good."

As I explained a few days ago, people say they want to see the inner workings. What are the inner workings of the Senate? It is what they do when drafting a bill. The committee spends hours picking out a particular word that might seem best to Senators. If anybody wants to see it, they can put it on television right now. I do not have the slightest objection. I can guarantee them one thing: They will not do it again because anyone who saw it would refuse to look at it again. If they tried to present it a second time, people would turn it off.

So if one wishes to show something of the Senate, it would make sense to think that they would show the things that would be of interest, to say the least, not the part that is of no interest, that does not present us in a particularly good light anyway.

Is it not much more important that we do our job than that we project one kind of image or some other kind of image?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have another problem that not many Members have. I am a member of a union and members of that union are television actors. My union would get awfully angry if I were appearing on television free and it might upset me that I did not get paid for it. But I do not think we ought to get paid for appearing on it here.

I will close by saying I hope we can beat this thing. I think it is a waste. I think we can do a better job without it. We can give our newspaper friends a better chance to report. There is nothing that will kill a newspaper faster than television.

I am going to have to leave the floor. I thank my friend for the questions and I assure him I shall support his efforts.

I thank the Chair for his courtesy.

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now resume consideration of the pending business, which the clerk will state.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 20) providing for television and radio coverage of proceedings of the Senate.

The Senate resumed consideration of the Senate resolution.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today we begin consideration of Senate Resolution 20, which was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, the majority leader of the U.S. Senate, to provide for television and radio—not just television, but television and radio—coverage of the proceedings of the Senate. Our consideration of this measure is a historic first, the first full-scale debate on the floor of the U.S. Senate on proposed legislative action designed to open the Senate Chamber to the ears of radio—and my distinguished colleague from Kentucky, the ranking minority member of the Rules Committee, I believe, is strongly in favor of that aspect of this measure—and to both the eyes and the ears of television for more than a specific one-time-only occasion.

This day has been a long time in coming, but I think it is, in a way, the acknowledgment by the Senate that television does exist. It is a significant fact of life in America, and we have been a long time accepting it as a fact of life in the Senate.

The genesis of this development is probably that historic day in the 18th century when the Senate voted to establish public galleries. That is when it really all began. Later, as the Chamber was expanded, the galleries were expanded. A walk 100 feet down the main corridor of the Capitol to the old Senate Chamber will show how small the galleries were in those days. A limited number of visitors could be accommodated in comparison with the size of the galleries today. The inclusion of television cameras in this Chamber will really be just another expansion of the gallery, another expansion of the number of people who can do what the limited number of people who sit in the galleries today can already do. As technology advances, we are able, in effect, to expand the galleries through the electronic media. But until we throw that switch, that expansion bogs down.

In the midforties, Mr. President, an old friend and distinguished colleague and a long-time Member of the House, who has served in both bodies, CLAUDE PEPPER, introduced during his Senate service the first resolution providing for broadcast coverage of floor proceedings. This was a forerunner of the many resolutions which subsequently have been directed toward the same goal—first for radio and then for both radio and television.

CLAUDE PEPPER today has made a strong reputation as one who advocates the rights of senior citizens.

But when he introduced this resolution, he was a young man, just 43 years old. I guess that is still classified as a young man.

Today, he is a senior citizen, one of the most respected senior citizens. He is no longer in his forties, not even in his fifties, not even in his sixties, not even in his seventies. He is 81 years old. Yet, we are just getting around to the floor consideration of a resolution which reflects his idea. It may say something about the Senate, the pace of the Senate, that this has taken us nearly 40 years.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

Mr. MATHIAS. Surely, I am happy to yield.

Mr. LONG. Did it ever occur to my good friend, the distinguished chairman of the committee, that perhaps that demonstrates the wisdom of the Senate, that it has not acted favorably on that measure during this interim?

Mr. MATHIAS. I reflected on that a little, and it could be the wisdom of the Senate or, as my friend from Louisiana might consider, it is the timidity of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MATHIAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator really think, then, that if they thought it was good for the country, if they felt that timid, they would withhold doing something that they thought was in the national interest?

Mr. MATHIAS. The Senator from Louisiana raises the question whether the Senate was so wise that it did not do that. I think it is an equally valid speculation that it was perhaps too timid, but either of us could be right or either of us could be wrong. That is one of the things we will determine during the course of the next week.

I hope the Senator from Louisiana will recall that the idea has not been lying dormant, totally dormant, during the past 37½ years. Things have been happening which would indicate that perhaps it is more timidity than wisdom.

In 1947, television cameras were permitted in the House Chamber for the one-shot coverage of the opening of the 80th Congress, and we had television cameras in the Senate recording the testimony of General Marshall before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on his great plan to reconstruct Europe, the plan which is recorded in history as the Marshall plan. We had that on television.

Since then, we have seen, among other things, the inauguration and successful continuation of gavel-to-gavel TV coverage of the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

In the Senate, we had cameras for the televising of the swearing-in ceremony for the Vice President of the United States, Nelson Rockefeller. We had the radio broadcast coverage of the Panama Canal debate.

Incidentally, I think that as a test case, that is a very interesting one, because people who commented to me on the Panama Canal debate said, "My, I didn't know you fellows knew as much as you did." They were pleasantly surprised that Members of the Senate could get on their feet and engage in colloquy, not something handed to them by their staff, but engage in colloquy back and forth among themselves, on a totally extemporaneous basis, and actually showed that they knew something. I think that, of course, is one of the tests.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

Mr. MATHIAS. Surely. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is the distinguished chairman aware of what in fact happended in the course of the Panama Canal debate. After the matter had been debated at great length here in this body, it was finally agreed by unanimous consent that we would vote at a given hour. When the hour came, with the entire Nation listening breathlessly to the radio so as to hear how the vote was going to go, a request was made to extend the time so Senators could make further speeches. At that point the Senator from Louisiana objected to extending the time?

The people had a right to hear the vote. They did not tune in to hear any more speeches. They had been hearing speeches for weeks. They wanted to hear the vote. So, we briefly extended the time and let Senators make still more speeches, when what the people really wanted to hear was a vote, and everybody agreed there was going to be a vote at that time.

Mr. MATHIAS. I do not think the people were too shocked by the fact that there was some additional word to be said. After all, the American people believe in joining associations and committees and commissions. Anybody who has ever served on a church board or a school board or a town council would be familiar with that particular syndrome. I think it would be reassuring to them to know the U.S. Senate is so human an institution.

Mr. LONG. May I ask a further question? Did it ever occur to the Senator that one reason Senators wanted to speak at that moment was that at that point they knew radios would be tuned in all over America to hear the vote, and that would give them the largest audience to address? Perhaps that was the reason why Senators wanted to make further speeches at that time.

Mr. MATHIAS. The statistics overall do not support that conclusion. I think one of the interesting tests of this whole theory is the coverage of committee sessions. Almost every day, when Senate committees are in session, there is television coverage; cameras are in the committee rooms. They grind away. The lights are on. I do not find that it greatly alters the behavior of the committee members.

However, I will not belabor the point. I merely want to indicate that the issue before us is not novel. In one aspect or another, we deal with TV every day. I suspect that the basic arguments both for and against it are not novel, either.

Listen for a moment to these words:

> Surely the people of this country are sovereign. Surely all of us regard ourselves as their spokesmen. We are all trying to serve their objectives and their purposes. If they could be brought, as it were, * * * as the visitors in the galleries are privileged to be, to be witnesses of the deliberations * * * in Congress. I believe it would be in furtherance of the Democratic process.

That kind of thing has been said in connection with Resolution 20. In fact, those were words spoken by Senator PEPPER in 1944. I must confess I think they have a good deal of validity and persuasiveness today, perhaps even more than when they were uttered in 1944, because they expressed then and they express now the fundamental concept behind broadcast coverage of our proceedings, and that is, in CLAUDE PEPPER'S words, "furtherance of the democratic process." That is what it is all about. That is all we are trying to do.

I am sure we will hear during our debate on Senate Resolution 20 about technical aspects of televising the Senate, things such as whether or not the required lighting might be too bright, whether it is going to be too hot, questions as to whether cameras could follow a Senate debate in which, rare as it might be, every 1 of the 100 Members of the Senate would participate, speaking from their desks in different parts of the room, speaking extemporaneously without any prearranged sequence, without any pattern by which there would be a director.

I think that during the debate we will certainly hear about institutional aspects of the matter, whether broadcast coverage would affect quality of debate, and whether, as the Senator from Louisiana has suggested, it would affect the quantity of debate.

And I am sure that in the last analysis we will deal with the matter of cost. On the day the President's budget comes down it is appropriate that we think about the question of cost. I know that this is a vital consideration for the majority leader, and I share his concern in that respect.

But each of these factors, the technical issues, the institutional issues, and the cost issue have been studied at great length.

Back in 1974 the Joint Committee on Congressional Operations held extensive hearings and concluded that Congress should conduct a carefully designed and limited test to determine the feasibility and desirability of a permanent system for broadcasting activities in the Senate and House Chambers.

In the other body, in the House of Representatives, this led to the televised proceedings with which we are all familiar. In the Senate it led to more tests and more studies, most of which have been conducted by, or in cooperation with, the Rules Committee.

Since the midseventies we have tested lighting, and we have observed televised proceedings in other legislative bodies in this country and around the world. We have had a chance to study approximately a dozen Senate resolutions calling for the broadcasting of floor activities, either specially selected activities or the floor proceedings in their entirety.

In two of these we acted favorably: As I mentioned, the swearing-in of Nelson Rockefeller as President of the Senate and Vice President of the United States, and the debate on the ratification of the treaty affecting the status of the Panama Canal.

Other resolutions, prior to the pending resolution, have expired without action.

For 3 days last year, the 8th and 9th of April and the 5th of May, the Rules Committee held hearings on Senate Resolution 20. Among those who testified were some of our colleagues in the Senate, Members of the other body, the Architect of the Capitol, the Senate Sergeant at Arms, the Librarian of Congress, professional staff from the Congressional Research Service, representatives of television networks and radio, and a number of interested parties. The final committee vote to report the resolution was unanimous.

So we come to the floor with a wealth of opinions and background information and statistical data and findings.

I certainly am the first to admit that this is a complex issue. It has many facets, and I shall just mention some of them very briefly. Of prime importance, as we begin our debate, is a clear understanding of what it is that television viewers will see if the Senate decides to televise its proceedings.

And I think it is fair to ask the question: Will it be entertainment? Or will it be news? Or will it be a report?

And if the Senator from Louisiana were to ask me which I think it will be of those possibilities, I would say none of them. What we will be making here is a record. It is a record of the proceedings of the U.S. Senate.

I hope it will be entertaining. I hope it will have news value. I hope that it will have some merit as a report. But basically it is a record. It is the record. And just as the printed RECORD was an innovation at one time in the legislative halls of the world and among parliamentary bodies of the world, this is embodying the technology of our day in a new media to make a record, and it is just as simple as that.

Let me explain exactly what I mean. When the House sessions first went on the air, there was a review in a newspaper called Variety. It is the show biz newspaper. And it headlined the House broadcasts as "Dullsville, D.C."

I must say to my colleagues that we must brace ourselves here in the Senate for a similar review. Inadvertently, perhaps, we may entertain at times, but it is not our prime purpose, nor is it the prime purpose of having the proceedings televised. Dullsville might be compared to Dallas or to General Hospital, but we should not lose sight of the fact that a televised Senate will not be competing for ratings, and Senators will not be, as far as I am concerned, eligible for Emmy's. Nor will it be a TV special. It will not be show business. Therefore, whether or not we are a theatrical hit is immaterial, and it is not something with which we should concern ourselves.

Furthermore, the televised proceedings in themselves will not be news, not news as defined by Webster, which is a report of recent events. It will be a record of the events themselves. So, therefore, while televised proceedings might provide material for a report of recent events, they are not the report itself. The reporting is handled very thoroughly by our friends in the news media galleries, and what we do here on the floor of the Senate is simply not news according to the Webster definition until someone extracts the salient points and puts them into context and makes a report on them.

To reiterate, televised proceedings are not entertainment. They are not news. They are not in themselves a report. They are simply an account of what we do as we do it, which can provide instruction for students, material for historians, and information for citizens.

Perhaps, some have argued, the intent of televising floor proceedings might not be to provide entertainment. But what about that bit of showmanship that dwells within us all, not least in the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from West Virginia? And what about that bit of politician in all of us that responds to microphones and television cameras?

The question has been asked, Will speeches be more florid? Will they be more numerous? Will they be longer?

A man who has had practical experience with those questions is a Member of the other body, Representative CHARLIE ROSE, and I will let CHARLIE ROSE answer those questions by quoting from testimony that he gave to the Rules Committee. He said:

> Somebody said to us when we started (preparing for the televising of House proceedings): Won't the House Members play to the gallery? Well, we went back and found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of many years ago where, when the Senate decided to admit the press and the public, the concern was expressed, over 100 years ago, that Senators would play to the gallery. Well, that has not occurred.

The Rules Committee examined this particular concern at great length and in great depth, particularly by studying the empirical evidence presented by legislatures which had adopted television, and here is what we found, as stated in our report:

> The general opinion seemed to be that when the televising of legislative proceedings begins there is—> an initial moderate upsurge in the number of speeches and jockeying for TV spots, desirable TV slots.

And I call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to this—

Soon the awareness and the attention to the new phenomenon subside, and again I particularly call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to this fact, that after that, it is generally business as usual, at least to the extent that any changes are so minor that they are of little concern to the legislators.

There is also another answer to this question of showboating or grandstanding, call it what you will, and the majority leader expressed that answer in this way. He said:

> I heard somebody say one time that in politics, especially statewide or national politics, TV can spot a phony a mile away.

And that is true. Actually, in the Rules Committee we found from testimony presented at hearings that since the advent of television in the House of Representatives, the speeches there have seemed to be more precise and less flamboyant and all-round better and, as the Senator from Louisiana will remember from our colloquy the other day, we actually showed the figures—and they are part of the RECORD—that the hours of the House of Representatives in session have decreased—not increased but decreased—since television was installed in that Chamber.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. MATHIAS. Surely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. May I say to the Senator—and I do not wish to trespass on his time at this moment—I just wish to make the point that we will respond to that, those of us who take the other side of the argument. It is our view that this same study would prove our point rather than the Senator's point, but I will wait. I would be happy to hear his presentation in full, and in due course I will respond to it. But I have had the opportunity to see those figures, and I challenge the conclusion the Senator draws from them. But I applaud the Senator's right to make his case, and in due course I hope the Senator will be present to hear me respond to it.

Mr. MATHIAS. I shall wait with great interest the Senator's being able to draw any other conclusion from those figures than that television has not inspired long-winded attempts to gain the attention of that magic eye.

Mr. LONG. I believe I have a good response to it, Senator. But to be fair to the Senator and to the Senator from Louisiana as well, I personally do not think it is a good idea to try to prove my point on the other Senator's time. It is better for him to make his point and support it, and in due course I will respond to it, and I will in due course undertake to show that I believe the same study would prove my point rather than his.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. MATHIAS. Let us turn to another problem area which does not have to do with people jockeying to get on, but what about those times when there are not enough Senators on the floor, and the fear that, just as at this very moment, there would be more chairs empty than filled and whether that lamentable condition would be shown on television. What about that?

Well, the shots, the television shots, can be so designed that the empty chairs do not show. But maybe another possibility, and one that I do not reject out of hand, is that we show the world what we are as we really are. People who view this scene right now at this moment see us as we are. What is wrong with the rest of the world seeing us as we are? Instead of taking this as a disadvantage, we could seize it as an opportunity to educate viewers on the importance of other things that Senators do besides attending on the floor of the Senate?

I think, perhaps, there is too widespread a view that Members of the Senate drift down midmornings, perhaps closer to noon when the Senate usually convenes; they enjoy a good lunch at taxpayers' expense—which, as the Senator from Louisiana knows, is far from the truth and totally wrong; that then we drift onto the floor and we utter a few rhetorical phrases, and then we go off to dinner at some foreign embassy around town. That is the kind of view that I am afraid too many Americans have of the Senate day.

Well, if, in fact, we get this realism of television into this Chamber, we can begin to educate the public that when Members are not here, they are probably in a committee or they are meeting with constituents in their offices or they are handling the voluminous paperwork that goes with every Senate day and, I think, perhaps, give to the public a sense of the importance of the committee process, the importance of the work that Senators do away from the floor.

I think a similar process of education could be used to acquaint viewers with perplexing parliamentary procedures which serve to guarantee the rights of individual Senators, the unusual position of the U.S. Senate which is unique in the world, where a U.S. Senator has powers that are unknown in any other parliamentary body.

We have the ability, for example, to engage in debate as long as we have the life and the breath to defend the interests of our constituents and the principles to which we adhere.

We have the ability to introduce amendments on any measure, on any subject, an unusual ability which is not reflected in other parliamentary bodies.

We share with the President of the United States the power of making appointments to the Cabinet and to the courts, to ambassadorial posts, to other high office in this Republic, and very often that power of appointment is the subject of debate here.

We share with the President of the United States the power of formulating the foreign policy of this country, an unusual exercise of parliamentary authority, that is frequently the subject of discussion here on the floor of the Senate.

So I think this would be an opportunity for education about the work of the Senate, and I do not fear the fact that it may occasionally disclose that not every Member of the Senate is present on the floor for every minute of every day that the Senate is in session. I do not think we have to go into the mechanics of these educational projects at this time, but I just want to mention them to indicate that empty chairs and the complicated parliamentary procedures are not insurmountable obstacles.

Now, there have been objections on the part of certain people who are bothered by the possible inconsistencies between the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Senate Journal with what is preserved on the video tapes. They are bothered by the problems that may occur in reconciling the RECORD and the video tapes. But I think, here again, it helps to remember that televising is only intended to transmit what any visitor in the gallery—now, tonight, tomorrow—can observe, complete with grammatical errors, with extraneous matter, and with other materials which sometimes damage clarity and precision.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Senator will just withhold for a moment——

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Mr. MATHIAS. The video tape is a rough copy—it is not the certified and official document—just as we may have a rough copy of a speech or a book. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Senate Journal are the final products.

And it simply is an extension of what the visitors to the gallery see every day. They may hear what the Senator from West Virginia has said, and when they read his remarks, there may be a word or a phase slightly different.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will my able colleague from Maryland yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, as my two colleagues who are now on the floor (Mr. LONG and Mr. MATHIAS), along with the Presiding Officer (Mr. ABDNOR), we gather to discuss the televising of the Senate.

Mr. MATHIAS. As the Senator from West Virginia knows, we are told on good authority that when two or three are gathered together——

Mr. RANDOLPH. There will be the Democrats. That is a modification of the Bible. I hope I am not upsetting the Senator by using our party.

Mr. MATHIAS. That was not what I had in mind, but I will accept that. I thought that the Senator, with his interest in religious matters, would recognize that as a call from a higher authority, even than the Democratic Party.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I hope that I may be permitted to step back across the years and recall that in 1930 I was first a candidate for membership in the Congress for the seat in the House of Representatives from the Second District of West Virginia.

Incidentally, in 1930, I won the nomination but lost the election.

Mr. MATHIAS. And the country lost an opportunity.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I did run again in 1932, as you know, and was privileged to come to the House of Representatives in the year that matchless maker of leadership, Franklin Roosevelt entered the White House. He held within the destiny of our country those programs which proved themselves then and now. These programs proved to be the infrastructure of our Republic.

Now, to go back to 1930, I was speaking in the community of Paw Paw. Paw Paw is located in Morgan County in the eastern panhandle of our State. Berkeley Springs is its county seat.

Mr. MATHIAS. Paw Paw is also, if the Senator will not mind the interruption, one of the most beautiful spots in America. I would urge everyone who has not been there to go and see the Paw Paw tunnel and the gorge that leads to it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, Paw Paw is an interesting place with, of course, very industrious people.

But I was speaking that night in a county that was heavily Democratic, once in a while, but the once in a whiles were so seldom that you could not realize that we had many of our party there, certainly not on election day. But the registered majority was very heavily Republican. I was speaking and I thought I had hit a high note, or at least said something that might appeal to the people. Perhaps the 100 who were present. As I did that, the lights went out. I stood in complete darkness on the platform.

The Senator has mentioned religious matters. I did know many, many hymns then, as I do now. There is a hymn that says: "Let the lower lights be burning, send a gleam across the way, some poor fainting, struggling seaman I must rescue, I must save."

I paraphrased it by saying: "Let the lower lights be burning, send a gleam across the way, some poor fainting, struggling Republican, I must rescue, I must save."

The lights went up. They felt sorry for me, perhaps, those that had turned the lights out, and gave us light once again.

But, to come back to the point that Senator MATHIAS is making. I listened very intently to what my colleague from across the Potomac River has said on these matters. The Mathias family is very closely a part of the State of West Virginia and his interests are there as well as in Maryland itself.

But he indicated that those in the galleries see the Senate at work. I only want to comment that later I will be talking about an amendment that I shall offer. The amendment will require Members to vote from their desks and not vote from just any place in this Chamber, calling out their vote in the midst of an uproar. Our proposal will allow the clerks to hear that vote clearly. I speak fondly of all Members of the body. I respect their judgment and their conscience, but I do not always approve of their conduct in the body itself. And yet I hesitate when I rise and call attention to the Presiding Officer's need to restore order in the Senate. Because in the well of the Senate many times Members are congregated as if they were playing ice hockey or soccer or whatever you might want to call it. It is not the well of the House in the sense that we think of it as it is today, calm and empty. Today the three of us who are here, are conducting business at our desks. The public does not see a jungle in the U.S. Senate as we oftentimes have as we cast our votes.

I wonder if it would not be much better than to think in terms of televising the Senate, that to first of all make certain other modifications in the Standing Rules of the Senate. I think definitely improvements, which would come if Senators would, of necessity, because of the rule change that I hope will be accepted, vote from their desks, rather than to vote as they roam around this Chamber.

I hesitate to say this, because my colleagues know that it is not personal in this reference, but oftentimes a Senator will move in from the cloakroom and barely have his head showing and he will say "yea" or "nay", as if he were voting in this Chamber. He is not at his desk. This Chamber should be a place where Members discipline themselves and give to those that are in the galleries, our guests, the courtesy of decorum in the Chamber. Hopefully there will be some modification of the resolution which finally is passed that will enable those watching on television or in the galleries the opportunity to see the Member voting from his desk and, very frankly, speaking from his desk. The latter is not a part of the amendment which will be under consideration at a later time, but it is a good idea.

I asked the able majority leader, Mr. BAKER, a few days ago if he did not feel that there are possibly changes in the rules that would improve this body. I vividly recall the period several years ago when we had a Senate committee to look into these matters. They met under the chairmanship of an excellent man from Iowa, Senator Harold Hughes. I testified there about possible rules changes as others testified. The years go by, and we still have not taken the action that I think is an affirmative action to improve the operation of the Senate.

Would the Senator from Maryland comment on this suggestion that I am making, which is, in a sense, the changing of the rules of the Senate as is proposed? Certainly the learned, knowledgeable Senator from Louisiana, Mr. LONG who is here constantly on this subject, well knows it is a fact that whatever we are doing here, in one way or another, is changing the rules of the Senate.

Mr. MATHIAS. I am happy to respond to the Senator from West Virginia and comment briefly, because I know this is a matter in which he has taken a serious and a long-term interest. I am aware that he has discussed it with the majority leader, and he proposes to offer an amendment to this resolution at some proper point in the proceedings.

I will listen very carefully to the debate on that amendment.

Certainly, with the confusion which takes place during a rollcall vote, and particularly on which is a cliffhanger, and the milling around that goes on in the well of the Senate, the termination of that scene is a consummation devoutly to be desired. If this resolution might be the vehicle by which that could be brought about, it would just be one additional benefit the Senate would receive from it.

I think we could talk a little bit about how that would be possible and whether, in the situation under which we are laboring, it could be done. Personally, I have great sympathy for the position of the Senator from West Virginia, and we will discuss this a little further as we get on with this discussion.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Would I interfere with the continuity of the Senator's remarks or appeal if I spoke a little more on a subject related to that? I could withhold any further comment if the Senator would prefer me to do so.

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Senator would withhold, I will advise him that the majority leader also wants to present his statement on this matter.

If I may conclude my remarks at this time, I could then yield briefly to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MATHIAS. The question arises as to the control of the operation of Senate television. That is a crucial question. The operation of Senate television, if it is approved, in my opinion should be kept in the hands of the Senate itself, just as in the other body the House conducts its own television operation. We have to keep in mind again that we are attempting merely to make available to an expanded gallery, a greatly expanded gallery, an opportunity to observe our legislative activities. This would not necessarily include dramatic reaction shots.

If the Senator from West Virginia makes a telling and eloquent statement, as he frequently does, the camera is reporting his statement and not necessarily the reaction of the Members or the gallery to what he is saying.

To guard against Senate activities becoming, on occasion, the type of show business that we have discussed here, control should be in our own hands.

Another question that arises is whether it should be gavel-to-gavel coverage or whether it should be something less. That is a question that has often been asked.

Historians choose gavel to gavel coverage, and so do the television network representatives when they are given a choice between gavel-to-gavel and mere segments.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield at that point, Mr. President?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. If this Senator were being shown on commercial television, can the Senator imagine how it would be covered? After all, those who are doing it must try to hold their audience if they can, during such a lull as a quorum call. The producer of the show and the people who are announcing and adding the so-called color would discuss what is going on among themselves, what is likely to happen in the future, even run some commercial television ads, and, in due course, come back to what was happening after the quorum call was behind us?

Can the Senator show me any good reason whatever for presenting by satellite or any other way a situation where we are merely calling the roll, merely passing some time waiting for a Senator to come to the floor? Would it not make better sense that even if the Senate were to be on television that during such time as that you would show something else, show what was going on, on the House floor, to do anything rather than just show somebody something as dull as dust, or duller than dust, such as a quorum call where all you are doing is waiting for somebody to appear on the scene and make his speech?

Can the Senator tell me the purpose of presenting a quorum call where there are very few Senators present, and someone drifts in and someone drifts out? Can the Senator tell me the purpose of putting that on live television?

Mr. MATHIAS. Let me ask the Senator from Louisiana a question in response. Does he think we ought to empty the gallery every time there is a call for a quorum, to chase people out of the gallery because they would not be interested in that? As a matter of fact, perhaps some people do leave the gallery, but they do it voluntarily. With television, they flick that switch. That is like getting up and leaving the gallery. If, in fact, they have some interest in it, they can watch it. It is the record, and if the record is to be complete, let them see the complete record.

The decision to discard gavel-to-gavel coverage and to concentrate just on major newsworthy events presents its own problems.

I do not make light of the concern of the Senator from Louisiana about the fact that that would not be interesting. But if we say, "We are only going to televise the interesting things," the question is, "Interesting to whom?"

What is interesting to the Senator from Maryland may not be interesting to the Senator from Texas. The Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from West Virginia may find some things more interesting than others. So it becomes a very subjective question, interesting to whom?

Mr. LONG. May I ask a further question?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. If the taxpayers are going to pay for it and you have something that is interesting to, let us say, at least 200 people out of 1,000, and what you are showing here is interesting to less than 1 person in 1,000, would it not make more sense to put on something interesting to 200 people rather than something that is interesting to 1 person?

Mr. MATHIAS. Now the Senator is asking a question which, if he will bear with me, we will get to in later discussion.

I might say that in the language of lighting experts, expert opinions are available concerning the heat and glare which would be generated by the lighting necessary to permit television cameras to record the activities in the Chamber. Suffice it to say that we have been told that quality pictures can be produced without inflicting either high temperatures or disturbing, bright light on our Members.

Now, as I promised the Senator from Louisiana, we come to the cost, which is one of the most significant aspects we have to consider.

The Architect of the Capitol has estimated that the total cost for lights, eight cameras, cable, and control room equipment would be about $3.5 million. Installation would be performed by the Architect's staff and employees of the Senate Recording Studio, and would be charged to current salary accounts.

According to our estimates, equivalent costs for a five-camera installation would approximate $2.5 million.

We have had some further estimates which would revise those figures downward because of developments in the industry, but these were the estimates provided.

The Architect has also recommended the enhancement or replacement of the existing audio system at a cost of $116,000. Perhaps we would have a more convenient method than the microphones presently in use.

Annual operating costs would be about $300,000 a year. Video and archival service by the Library of Congress would be about $93,000 a year.

Spare parts and maintenance labor would be about $200,000 a year. That is one side of the scale.

On the other side of the scale, we have what can best be summed up by the words that I quoted from my friend, CLAUDE PEPPER, at the beginning of these remarks, we have the furtherance of the democratic process. This concept has been described in various ways.

Mr. President, let me comment that, in response to the interest of the Senator from Louisiana in the economics of this, when we talk about the cost of television with the costs that I have just been stating, we are talking about only one-fifth, about only 20 percent, of the current cost for Senators' newsletters, which is another way of expanding our communication. Newsletters cost five times what the television system we are considering would cost. Television costs are a lot less than the postal rate we are discussing now in the Rules Committee. And newsletters, meritorious as they may be, entertaining as they may be, informative as they may be, are not a record.

What we are trying to do has been expressed by the majority leader, who said that a democracy thrives on support and public support thrives on open government.

Carl Bernstein, testifying before the Rules Committee as a representative of ABC News' Washington Bureau, noted that the adoption of Senate Resolution 20 would assure greater understanding of the legislative process, illuminate the great issues, and clarify the deliberations which affect the lives of all Americans.

Mr. President, I think we have to ask ourselves, is this kind of furtherance of the democratic process worth the price? Even in these days of austere budgets and belt-tightening, I personally think that it is. In fact, the dictates of economy themselves demand that we make it possible for the citizens of the Nation to understand more fully and, through their communications, to participate more actively in the momentous decisions which will affect their lives and their pocketbooks. Not all of our citizens can afford to come to Washington to observe this body in action but, as the distinguished majority leader has said, through radio and television coverage, virtually everyone could make the electronic journey that would give them a window on the Senate floor.

When we are talking, as we do these days, in terms of budgets and deficits amounting to many billions of dollars, the expenditures that I have mentioned to let our citizens know how we are dealing with foreign affairs and domestic issues and defense and the economy would, I think, be money well spent.

Another positive consequence of broadcasting our Senate floor proceedings could be the wide availability throughout the country of the complete spoken activities of each daily session of the Senate. As all of us are keenly aware, printing and publishing costs have skyrocketed. Individuals now find prohibitive the cost of a subscription to the daily issues of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We have cutback on free distribution of the RECORD to depository libraries and other public service institutions. A move that we can make to compensate for this decreased communication, this decreased reporting to the country, would be broadcasting our floor proceedings, which would enable many more Americans to become better informed about the crucial work of the U.S. Senate without incurring the cost of a subscription to the RECORD.

Mr. President, what I have said has been mainly about television, but many of my remarks pertain to both radio and television. However, it has been proposed, and my dear friend from Kentucky, in particular, has sponsored the concept, that we limit the broadcast coverage of proceedings to radio alone. So, I would like to comment on this particular aspect of the question.

During the debate on the ratification of the Panama Treaty, radio did prove itself, if that were necessary. We know what it can do, and with the passage of Senate Resolution 20, we shall welcome it as part of the team which is composed of both radio and television. However, to limit the coverage to radio alone would impose unnecessary restrictions on our attempt to further the democratic process. With its limited amount of available time each day and its already committed number of channels, radio could hardly be expected to provide gavel-to-gavel coverage. The result would be limited coverage which, by its very nature, would exclude important segments of the floor proceedings and present a spotty record of our decisionmaking process.

Furthermore, the prospect of limited coverage again brings up the question of who is to determine what is used and what is omitted. That, God forbid, could become a nasty, partisan issue, deciding whether the subjects that were embarrassing to one party would be broadcast at the behest of the other party and vice versa. That is not the kind of spirit in which we want to see the proceeding in the Senate conducted.

One point more, Mr. President. Although radio and television are both electronic media, I think every Member of the Senate is sophisticated enough in communications to know that they have very different audiences, and different audiences, in particular, at different times of the day. Since our purpose is to present a record of what we are doing to those who are entitled to know, it would seem that we should direct our efforts toward the larger rather than toward the smaller audiences. It is obvious that very few people will be watching television while they are commuting in their automobiles. Those people can be reached by radio. But there will also be people at home who will be watching by television. So we are using the miracles of modern communication to present the best record that we are capable of presenting, and the public can take it in the form in which it is prepared to receive it.

Before I conclude, Mr. President, I should note that, as stated in the report of the Rules Committee, televising the floor proceedings of the Senate will require no change in the Standing Rules of the Senate. Detailed procedures for camera operation and for direction will be needed. These, in accordance with the will of the Senate, can either be hammered out by the full Senate or they could be delegated to the joint leadership, or they could be delegated to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

I have no personal feeling on that score. I think a normal repository would be the Rules Committee. But it does not have to be, and I am certainly open to discussion on that issue.

The regulations should insure that the television record faithfully covers the debate as recognized by the Presiding Officer of the Senate and that it avoids all extraneous activity.

For years, Mr. President, we have watched a succession of Presidents use television as the "bully-est" pulpit in our history to convey their views, to advise of their programs, to enhance the perception of the executive branch of Government.

That is one of the reasons why the Office of the President has become such a predominant feature of the U.S. Government in modern times. That is one reason why the executive branch looms larger than the legislative and judicial branches in the perception of the public as it looks toward Washington and looks toward the Federal Government.

A degree of response is now provided by the televised sessions in the other body. The House of Representatives now has a presence, where before there was an absence. But the voice of the Senate, to a large extent, has been confined to these four walls, to the range of our voice.

So it is time that the bully pulpit in the White House be supplemented with an equally strong voice from Capitol Hill and that the democratic process of participatory government be extended by the Senate in the same way it already has been extended by the White House through the miracle of electronic communication, the same way it already has been extended by our colleagues in the other body through the miracle of electronic communication. We can accomplish this historic feat by adopting Senate Resolution 20.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

Mr. MATHIAS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LONG. Does my very dear friend honestly think that if we were to extend the platform or the podium of the Senate to the public across the country the same way the President has it, or similar to that degree, Senators would not make more speeches in this body? Does he really think Senators would remain in their seats when they could make a speech on that subject and have general approval of that speech, even though it might not be necessary to change some votes because the matter might be agreed on? Does the Senator think Senators would remain silent to the extent they do now? Does the Senator regard it as a bully pulpit?

Mr. MATHIAS. That is what Theodore Roosevelt called it. He said the White House is a bully pulpit.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator really think that if Senators had this kind of bully pulpit available to them, they would not make more speeches?

Mr. MATHIAS. Does the Senator think the country would be worse off or better off if Senators did make good speeches that explained issues, that educated the public, that helped the public to understand the terrible dilemma of our times?

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator inviting me to answer the question?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. In my judgment, Senators make at least twice too many speeches the way it is now, and their speeches are too long.

Mr. MATHIAS. Maybe what the Senator is saying is that they are making too many speeches that are not of the quality that commands the interest of the country. This is exactly what the majority leader has said he thinks television will do. It will stimulate the interest of Senators in making better speeches and shorter speeches, better constructed speeches, more succinct speeches. That, in fact, is the record of experience of other legislative bodies.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I address myself further to the Senator?

I simply say to the Senator that my love for the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) is so great that I would not want to prove him wrong on this on his time. Therefore, I will not attempt to prove him wrong on his time. But in due course, Mr. President, I will respond and attempt to show the other side of the argument.

Regardless of the outcome, Mr. President, my admiration and fond affection for the Senator from Maryland will not be diminished. All of us are entitled to be in error from time to time. Even the Senator from Louisiana is entitled to be in error from time to time. I do not claim to be right on all occasions. All of us in this body from time to time are in error.

One great thing about the Senate which I would like to preserve, and I hope the Senator will share this belief with me, is that the Senate must be preserved as a body where a minority, be it wrong or be it right, has the opportunity to make its case. Only the merciful Almighty is in a position to know at the beginning of a debate on a crucial issue who is right and who is wrong.

Mr. MATHIAS. I say to the Senator from Louisiana that I concur wholeheartedly that the Senate must be a place where a minority always has an opportunity to make its case. I suggest that Senate Resolution 20 would make it possible for a minority to make its case before a wider audience than has ever been possible in the past, and that that could enhance the right of a minority to reach the public, to remind the public of facts that may not otherwise come to the public's attention.

However, I take this opportunity to thank the Senator from Louisiana for his personal observations. They are generous to the point of being charitable. They are much appreciated.

Although the Senator from Louisiana has modestly said he is subject to error, as are the rest of us, I have found over the years that he has not used the privilege of being wrong too lavishly, and his advice and counsel very often are right. Although I may think he is wrong on this occasion, it is one of the rare times in the years we have served together that I have so felt. However this is resolved, I think we are both approaching this with the interest of the Senate as an institution in our hearts and in our minds, and that what we want to bring out of this debate, regardless of the fate of Senate Resolution 20, is a better sense of the way in which the U.S. Senate can employ its talents—I am not ashamed to say that there are talents here; I think that there are very great talents in the Senate—how the Senate can employ its talents to promote the great interests of the Republic that we all serve.

That is the end we seek. It is not any narrow advantage or any kind of personal victory that either of us wants. We want to see the Senate continue as a great institution, a unique institution, one that is not paralleled anywhere in the world either in the power of individual Members or in its power as a legislative body. Certainly, neither of us wants to see any action taken which will diminish in any sense the luster of the years, but what we are trying to do is make sure that that luster is transmitted to the future in a way which is consistent with the changes that have occurred in life, with the technological advances that have altered the lives of ordinary Americans, and to try to make the Senate consistent with that different kind of life that Americans lead, a life very different from the lives of Americans who originally erected the Senate and gave it its first mandate.

But the Senator from Louisiana and I share only that goal and how we reach it is, of course, the question that lies before us.

I look forward to further discussion with him during the course of these proceedings.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. I yield.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding at this point.

Mr. President, I first commend the Senator from Maryland for his leadership on this issue. He has been out front and he has been a very articulate spokesman in trying to open up the proceedings in the Senate.

I also pay my respect to and commend the majority leader, Senator BAKER, for his leadership in this effort.

If it had not been for Senator BAKER and Senator MATHIAS, we would not be here today. I think both of these distinguished gentlemen deserve the praise of those of us who are going to sponsor Senate Resolution 20.

Mr. President, I favor Senate Resolution 20, providing for television and radio coverage of the proceedings in the Senate. This resolution has my full support because I believe it is time to bring the U.S. Senate into the 20th century and into the electronic age.

A resolution to open the doors of the Senate to the public was first adopted nearly 190 years ago, on February 20, 1794, in the first session of the Third Congress of the United States. The debate then was much as it is now: Those opposed to admitting the public feared a loss of decorum and free-spirited debate; those seeking to open our doors demanded greater accountability of the Senators to the people who elected them.

Mr. President, I wish each of my colleagues would sit down to read the journal of that early Senate. The debate on admitting the public focused on whether the Senators were responsible to their constituents for their conduct. The complaint was made that accounts of the Senate provided in newspapers and journals of the day were not adequate for a fully informed democracy. Charges of excesses of power and poor conduct in office were as much a subject of debate then, in that 3d Congress, as now in the 97th Congress.

In 1794 the Senate did open up its doors to the public. The argument that greater confidence would be placed in our Government by our fellow citizens carried the day, as it should now.

Today, in 1982, these same concerns for good government, open and free-spirited debate, and confidence by the people in their Government compel me to support this resolution to allow television and radio coverage of the Senate.

Some argue that intrusion of the public into the Senate through the eyes of television will harm the unique character of this body. If the eyes of the public will upset a representative body of the people, then we are in serious trouble already.

Others say that introduction of television will lead to more, longer, and less relevant speeches. The evidence is to the contrary. The report of the Committee on Rules and Administration indicates that rather, after the initial awareness and attention subsides, it is back to business as usual. The institution of the Senate will be better for this change.

The report of the Committee on Rules and Administration goes on to find no legal difficulties encountered by other legislatures that are now televised. The technical issues—lighting, cameras, and length of coverage—can be resolved without disturbing our work here. The rules and procedures of the Senate need not be changed.

As to the cost, the benefits far outweigh the dollars. Who in this body can say that those same benefits found by the Senators who first opened our doors in 1794, will not also come now?

Mr. President, I come from the House of Representatives where I spent 4 years and that debate was much like the debate going on today.

Let the record show that, in fact, the proceedings of the House of Representatives have not been prolonged, and the proceedings there are now much more informative to the people of this country. We have sophisticated technology that can bring us into the homes of the American people. I say it is simply time that the Senate follows suit and that the Senate enters the modern age. This is an electronics age, and although I come from a print background and support some of the perceptions of those in the print media, I am a realist who knows what is, in fact, ahead of us.

I participated in these same debates as a Member of the House of Representatives in 1977. Fears over the legal difficulties, technical issues, changes in the rules, and the dollar cost were all expressed then. But I supported coverage of the House then, and I believe it has proved a success. Most importantly, the fear of incessant debate staged for the cameras has also been put to rest. I said then that the House of Representatives must enter the electronics age. Now the time has come for the Senate.

Mr. President, the benefits of a more fully informed public, and the greater confidence in our Government which will come with it, demand that this resolution be passed.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Indiana for his support of the resolution as well as for his very kind personal references.

I think what he says has particular probative value because he has labored under television in the other body, and he knows exactly what the effect of having the eye of the camera on a legislative body is, and so when he comes to support this resolution, he does not come as an advocate of a theoretical matter but he comes because he has had the experience of knowing exactly what he is talking about, as, I might say, he usually does. So we thank the Senator.

What he said brings to mind a letter that I received after the hearings of the Rules Committee from a gentleman named Howard McLean of Roswell, Ga., and Mr. McLean, in commenting on the statement of a critic of television in the Senate, said:

> I do not believe he understands who may be interested, and he appears to be under the impression that the people who may be interested have such a low level of intelligence that we would not understand.
> If he would take the time to listen to the call-in segments on House programs, I believe he might be amazed at the wide interests and the degree of intelligence of the American public who are sincerely interested in what their elected officials are doing and how they are performing in the interest of the country as a whole.

I believe that that letter from Mr. McLean ties in very appropriately with the statement that has just been made by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I see that the distinguished and beloved chairman of the Rules Committee is in the Chamber as he always is diligent in a matter of this consequence before the Senate. I wonder if I could resume some of the colloquy we had last week on the question of the changes that inevitably will take place when we bring television to the Senate.

Perhaps it would be useful at this point for me to say that I fully expect that we will do so under circumstances through which I will be more than happy to support the measure. But it is not a simple decision. Many things will change, and many of the changes are those which we could not now anticipate, some which we may regret, and some with which we will be very happy.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me observe, many things in life have changed. The very existence of television has made enormous changes in American life, and I do not think we can ignore the fact they have already altered the procedures of the Senate, they have already altered the public perception of the Senate.

What this resolution hopes to do is, in a more deliberate and conscious way, to harness the potential values of these changes for the benefit of the Senate and of the country.

(Mr. D'AMATO assumed the chair.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I could not conceive of the Senator from Maryland having any other intention. But I wonder if I am wrong in feeling that we have not heard as much as we would be wont to do about the terms, the arrangements, that would accompany the televising of the proceedings.

Let me just put to the chairman a few questions and a few issues to which, perhaps, he would like to respond. I know he has many more than just these few in his mind.

Is it his thought that we were going to be televised from gavel to gavel, as the phrase goes, from the beginning of our session to the end each day or is it the thought that the leaders might agree on debates of special interest that would occasion television?

Mr. MATHIAS. As a preamble to answering the Senator's question, let me say, as a general proposition, that the system would operate in accordance with the will of the Senate, and I think the Senate itself has got to make a basic determination of what it will do.

My own personal recommendation will be that it should be gavel-to-gavel coverage because I think if you do less than that, you raise the invidious question, which the Senator from Louisiana and I discussed briefly a few minutes ago, of who decides what is an interesting debate.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Yes, I think that——

Mr. MATHIAS. That could have personal consequences, and it could have partisan consequences, both of which I would hope to avoid.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It seems to me that is a prudent judgment. In particular, if the Senate is to decide, and inasmuch as the Senate does decide by majority, there is always the question of the right of the minority. No institution in Government that I know of is more solicitous of those minority rights and the deeply constitutional role of the Senate.

Even so in the end the majorities, if they are sufficient, do prevail, and if you can avoid, in a sense, the minority which has been unfairly treated by decisions to televise or not to televise, it seems to me that is prudent and wise.

Do I take it from the chairman's remarks that when he says the Senate would have to decide, that the issue has come up about whether the specific arrangements are going to be set initially in the Committee on Rules, or whether it would be his judgment that the whole body deliberate, perhaps, a set of proposals that could be drawn up, but the initial decision is to be made on the floor rather than in committee?

Mr. MATHIAS. The resolution provides this would be a matter delegated to the Rules Committee.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Yes.

Mr. MATHIAS. I have no strong feeling about that personally. If the Senate would wish to take the time to draw up, as a part of the resolution, the detailed operational instructions, that would be one way of doing it. An alternative would be to confine this responsibility to the joint leadership. There are several alternative ways in which it could be done, or perhaps we could have some guidelines.

Since the members of the joint leadership are at the present time, and under most conditions, also members of the Rules Committee, some kind of arrangement of that sort——

Mr. MOYNIHAN. So I take it——

Mr. MATHIAS. That is not fixed in concrete.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. So I take it the distinguished chairman's response to me is that he is open to proposals in this matter, and that, as he says, the provisions in the resolution are not fixed in concrete. If a sufficient interest is shown on the floor to have these initial determinations made in some larger context, perhaps the leadership—but I think my choice would be for the Senate itself to debate and consider a proposal presented to it by the leadership, and that might be such an arrangement.

But may I alert him to the fact that there is some concern that this large a change not be agreed to save by the Senate as a whole. I do not expect that to be a judgment other than my own, but I have heard it from others, and I think the chairman has heard it and he is aware of it.

Mr. MATHIAS. Well, that reflects an old bit of folk wisdom of the American people not to buy a pig in a poke. You want to know what you are going to get, and I think that is an understandable caution, and I share it.

I would much rather devote an extra day or longer to this discussion than to have the Senate take action and then decide we had in some way been flawed in our consideration of it. In fact, as the Senator from New York, with his long experience in government at every level, knows, a lot of the ills of our times proceed from imperfect consideration of measures right here in the Congress.

Many of the sins that are attributed to the Supreme Court could have been avoided if Congress had been more careful in choosing the words of statutes which the Court finally had to interpret as it thought Congress intended.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Spanish have the saying "Prisa lente," which translates "hurry slowly," and I think the chairman shows just the attitude I would expect him to take from this.

May I ask him one final question on this occasion? As he knows, it is the feeling of many—I will not say all, but many—persons who are professional television producers, journalists who work in that profession, and in the commercial networks as well as—the privately owned as well as—the publicly owned, that they would hope to see the cameras controlled by the camera crews; in other words, that persons from—there is no secret about this—NBC, ABC, CBS, PBS, have cameras in the gallery that they would operate just as they do on Meet the Press or Face the Nation, as they do outside when we go out to visit them there.

What is the chairman's view on that, because there is certainly much to be said for it? It leaves the gentlemen and ladies of the press in the press gallery free to attend to whatever speakers they find interesting and to show a certain amount—and do other things when their attention is not immediately galvanized. How does the chairman feel at this point on this subject?

Mr. MATHIAS. At this point, I would feel that the Senate should operate the system and not the commercial network cameras.

I would, at the risk of repeating myself, say that the reason I think that this should be done is because what we are really attempting to do is produce a record. We are not an entertainment show. If you are looking for entertainment, it might well be that there would be a temptation to shift from the fascinating speech on taxation that the Senator from Louisiana was offering the Senate to another Member who may be making a wry face——

Mr. FORD. Or sleeping.

Mr. MATHIAS. Or having a pixie expression that the cameramen found intriguing, or there have even been suggestions, word bandying around the floor here, that Members who were in deep reflection appeared to be asleep. I am sure that is not the case. But those are the kinds of entertainment values that a commercial television station might seek.

We see it all the time. If you look at any one of the talk shows, very often the camera moves away from the speaker and moves to the audience reaction. Well, it is not audience reaction we are interested in. We are interested in a record of what is being said.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. May I just clarify this, I say to my friend from Louisiana, that in the Canadian House of Commons, the television there is described as an electronic Hansard, the purpose of which is strictly to record on television what otherwise would be recorded by the notetakers in the gallery who record the statements. In the Hansard, all you know is who is speaking and the summary that is said. This would be something that you would have a comparable thought with respect to.

Mr. MATHIAS. Exactly. I think it is interesting that the Senator from New York should raise the question of Hansard, because there was a day when there was no Hansard.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. There was a day when it was a crime to report the proceedings of Parliament.

Mr. MATHIAS. So that that was significant technological change.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It was a change in the perception of the liberties of the Englishmen who had a right to know what went on in Parliament and the Members of Parliament might fear what the king might learn.

Mr. MATHIAS. One of the reasons, as I recall it, for the development of Hansard was that there were informal and sometimes inaccurate private reports made of debates made in the Parliament. Hansard had at least the value of being accurate, although it might be viewed as an invasion of the privacy of the Parliament.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. For the longest while it would have been, then the Parliament changed its mind and I think it changed its mind for the better.

Mr. MATHIAS. So this electronic Hansard, as the Senator from New York has referred to it, is a further improvement in accurate reporting. That is exactly the way I would look at it.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. To think of it as an electronic CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would not be far from the judgment of the Senator.

Mr. MATHIAS. That is precisely the way I would view it. That is its purpose. It is not entertainment, it is not to see the pixie look on some Senator's face or the deep reflection that may have settled over other Senators' faces, but it is to report accurately what is said and done on the Senate floor.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the distinguished chairman. I apologize to my friend from Louisiana. I did not mean to go on like that. I do want to hear what he has to say.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I say to the Senator that I hope, in any event, we are not going to have the kind of coverage in the Senate that I have seen at the national conventions where cameras zero in on some people who are asleep in the audience or somebody whose child is sleeping or misbehaving next to her while someone is trying to make a speech to the convention. I hope we do not have the kind of thing where the person is making a crucial speech and all the networks just zero in or decide that would be the time for the anchormen to have a conversation among themselves.

Mr. MATHIAS. Not as long as I have any influence on the process whatever, even as a single Member out of a body of 100. It is, as the Senator from New York said, the electronic record. And that should concentrate on speakers, on the actor in the scene, and not on empty chairs or on other Members. It is not to pan around the room.

Mr. LONG. May I say to the Senator that I have experienced an occasion myself where one must be careful about this kind of thing? The witness can be testifying and two Senators can be whispering to one another, at which point one might break out in a big smile or perhaps a chuckle. It is very easy for that witness to gain the impression that they are laughing at him or making fun of him when, as a matter of fact, they might be whispering about something entirely different—that has nothing whatsoever to do with what the witness is testifying about.

Mr. MATHIAS. Let us be frank about it. Good members of legislative bodies have been severely damaged by the wrong kind of coverage. I recall that when I was a member of the General Assembly of Maryland, one of the most hard-working, respectable, and valuable members of the General Assembly, in an all-night session, stretched out on the sofa and caught 40 winks. Of course, that was the moment that a newspaper photographer chose to take his picture. So it looked as though here was a member who was sleeping during the session. Well, the circumstances were extraordinary, but all of those circumstances were not explained.

I am well aware of that. My personal experience encompasses those kinds of dangers. But I think we do not have to subject the Senate to those particular kinds of misinterpretation. Although the camera never lies, it can sometimes give a false impression that is an illusion, and that was one of those occasions.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator says that, and I am sure he means it 100 percent, the camera could never lie. But I have seen things happen on television which could cause me to doubt that statement. This Senator has seen people on television hold a letter up and say that the letter says thus and so and the letter they are holding does not say any such thing.

Mr. MATHIAS. Well, the Senator from Louisiana may have seen on this very Senate floor people say, "Here it is; here it is." If you ask them for it, you might find that it does not say exactly what the speaker has represented to the Senate. That is not the camera's fault. That is the speaker's fault.

Mr. LONG. It was once the displeasure for the Senator from Louisiana to see someone on television giving him a bad time and see the reporter for the TV network hold up a letter. He said "Here is a letter signed by the Senator that says thus and so," and proceeded to zero in on the Senator's signature; but he did not bother to read what the letter said. It did not say that at all. It said something quite different.

That is one of the things that this Senator is concerned about.

There are all sorts of things that can be shown on television that could be misleading. I just hope that, regardless of the outcome of this matter, we will never have the day when, by some action of this Senate, particularly in connection with this resolution, the Senate will appear in a light that would make us misunderstood. If it is to be presented at all, every effort should be made to see that the Senate is understood by the public, not misunderstood.

Mr. MATHIAS. I concur in those sentiments entirely. I assure the Senator from Louisiana that I do not think that that would necessarily follow from the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, 34 years ago in Chicago, Everett M. Dirksen, then a Congressman from Illinois, watched a baseball game on television. He returned to Washington and prophetically reported to his colleagues in Congress that—

> There is hardly a lounge or a hotel lobby that does not have a rather large television set. It is only a question of time, of course, until speeches by Members of the House and the Senate will be televised.

A question of time. Within a decade, television had become the dominant mass communications for this country, and altered, perhaps forever, the way Americans see themselves and perceive the world.

Yet the House of Representatives did not open itself to full television coverage until 1979 and—more to the point—the Senate has yet to do so. I propose we of the Senate answer the question of time with the word "now."

On July 17, 1981, the Senate took a big step toward that goal. While there are still reservations and disagreements and questions within the committee, the Committee on Rules and Administration unanimously passed a resolution which provides for television and radio coverage, including videotapes and radio broadcasting recordings, of proceedings in the Senate Chamber. The coverage would be continuous when the Senate is in session—except on those rare occasions when the Senate holds a private session for national security reasons.

That resolution, Senate Resolution 20, is now before us. It is no secret that this issue is of particular interest to me. I believe that radio and television will be a complement to the legislative process that is long overdue, that we must use the technological means at hand to further communication between Government and citizen, and that opening the Senate to radio and television can enhance and increase the public's involvement with the entire legislative process.

Throughout the first 7 years of its existence, the Senate operated behind closed doors—a historical fact I had not realized until research was begun on this subject—a policy that became the target of widespread scorn, as illustrated by a 1972 National Gazette article:

> Upright intentions, and upright conduct are not afraid or ashamed of publicity. The spirit of a Venetian Senate suits not, as yet, the meridian of the United States; neither does the conduct of a conclave comport with the feelings of Americans.

Introducing broadcasting to the Chamber merely extends the gallery; it would make it public, by 20th-century standards. Not every citizen in every part of the country can make the trip to Washington to sit in that gallery and view the Senate in person; but through radio and television coverage, virtually everyone could make the electronic journey that would give them a window on the Senate floor.

If we want the people to be with us, we must let the people in, and the technology is available to make this possible.

More Americans get their news from broadcast sources now than from any other form of communication. Television has become, in the words of media critic Michael Arlen, "America's Highway No. 1." It is time for the Senate to avail itself of this instrument and this resource.

This means that a long-standing, alleged barrier—the mystique of the Senate—would fall. But the mystique is not worth much if it fosters public distrust. You cannot earn the public trust unless you trust the public with the truth. Turning on the cameras to let the people see us as we really are can help bring about a new respect for public service and for public servants.

It is true that those with the interest and wherewithal to do so can read Senate deliberations in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but this is really only half the story. However, in my view, there are two channels of communication, in my view—the verbal and the nonverbal. The verbal has to do with our abilities to read a morning newspaper or tune in to a favorite radio talk show. The nonverbal has to do with our sense of sight, which completes and enables us more fully to appreciate an experience; it is an added dimension. Subsequently, television cameras in the Senate could make every American an eyewitness, in the fullest sense of that term.

Fortunately for the sake of argument in its behalf, the idea of opening the Senate to TV cameras and microphones is hardly unprecedented.

In 1947—the year of Mr. Dirksen's trip to Chicago—the first congressional event was broadcast "pictorially," as President Truman watched proceedings from the House of Representatives as part of an early experimental broadcast. The Senate was not involved with the broadcast, and the New York Times reported the next day:

> Mr. Truman, seated comfortably at his White House desk, had to be content with relatively mild proceedings as a substitute for the Senate row over efforts to oust Senator Theodore G. Bilbo.

Newly elected House Minority Leader Sam Rayburn applauded those "who brought television in and those who are conducting the proceedings under it now." Others chimed in with great expectations for the future relationship among television, Congress, and the American people.

More than a decade later, television made another dramatic leap in bringing the political process home to Americans, a leap that would forever alter the course of political campaigning. The televised debate between then Senator John F. Kennedy and then Vice President Richard Nixon marked a pivotal moment in the history of Presidential campaigns. The recent impact of the Ford versus Carter and Carter versus Reagan debates exemplifies the continuing effect of such broadcasts.

In essence, television has become as much an integral part of our political system as the voting booth.

Today, we have the successful example of the House of Representatives to attest to the wisdom and fitness of the concept. Television pictures from the House were first made available to the broadcast media on March 19, 1979. Since that time, most of the misgivings some may have had about the idea have been laid to rest, and the benefits from it have exceeded expectations.

Viewership is high and enthusiastic; satisfaction with the system seems almost unanimous. Early fears that Members would be intimidated or bedazzled by the television cameras in their midst have by and large been proven groundless. Showmanship has not run amok in the House, nor have its Members run off in droves to sign up for acting or elocution lessons. I am convinced that the open eye of the camera will not wreak havoc on the deliberative process in the Senate or turn its Members into performers vying for a spotlight—not any more than they already are, that is. We are, in one sense or another, vying for public attention—with the obvious exception of the present occupant of the Chair, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ), who is shaking his head to the contrary.

Some of my colleagues have argued that the presence of television would compromise not only the Senate's dignity but also the quality of debate on the Senate floor. I believe exactly the opposite to be true, and we have the experience, once again, of the House to support this contention. House leaders have told me that the presence of television has improved, not hindered, debate in that Chamber.

I favor the implementation of scheduled debates on the great issues of the day, intentionally to lay out for ourselves and for the public the parameters of current or impending public policy issues. I am not talking about normal debate carried out in the course of a legislative day but, rather, additional serious debates on the major issues confronting the Nation. I should like to see these debates scheduled so that not only the Senate participated in those votes, but also, there was an opportunity for all the country to see and hear, as that debate unfolded, the deliberations of the people who were elected to make those public judgments and to elaborate those public policies.

We really are not a deliberative body in the fullest sense; the great debates of other ages are the exception rather than the rule. But we might regain that status. The Senate is better equipped than any group I know of to undertake a careful examination and a detailed study of the great, indeed the historic, issues which must face this Republic and which must be resolved as public policy.

The Senate is a great deliberative body. But we so often fritter away that talent and that opportunity by the routine and the ordinary, to an empty Senate Chamber attended by a few, that we squander one of the prime resources of this body.

Possible pitfalls and drawbacks are far outweighed by opportunities and advantages, and we should remember that it is not only citizens of the present who will benefit from this step forward, but also those in the future. Senate proceedings would not only be broadcast live for same-day use but be taped and stored for future reference. School children, historians, and other citizens will be able to go to the U.S. Archives or a special library, decades or even hundreds of years from now, to watch this Congress deliberations live on tape.

If the technology had been available 100 years ago, we would now be able to watch the Lincoln-Douglas debates, or a speech by Daniel Webster. The point is that the technology is available now, and if we act, invaluable and living record of Congress and its proceedings, in addition to a unique perspective on history as it is made will be available to the future generations.

We owe it not only to ourselves but to those generations to come to make this possibility a reality.

No one could argue that television and the new era of communications that has come with it have had only positive effects on our society and our way of life. That is not the issue, for television is a reality. The issue before the Senate is whether we are going to utilize that which is best in television to improve our democratic process or continue to turn our backs on its intriguing and far-reaching possibilities.

Democracy thrives on public support, and public support thrives on open government. It is unrealistic to expect public support when we will not let the public see us doing what we do in the legislative process. It is time to draw back the curtain and open the Senate Chamber to the eyes and ears of the world.

Indeed, 100 years from now, when citizens of the 21st century look back on this momentous decision, they will wonder that we did not make it sooner.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I commend the able majority leader for the stand he has taken on television coverage of the Senate. Just as he has taken the lead in so many other worthwhile matters, he now takes the lead in this very important aspect of our Senate life.

I voice my support for Senate Resolution 20, the resolution which would authorize television and radio coverage of Senate proceedings. In my view, broadcast media coverage is warranted and wise, for several reasons. First, such coverage recognizes the basic right and need of U.S. citizens to know the business of their Government. Second, I believe it will lead to a more informed citizenry, and thereby hopefully improve the quality of our representative democracy. Third, television and radio coverage should enhance the image of Congress, the Senate, in particular, as an institution of Government. Fourth, it should, in the long run, improve the quality of Senate debate and decisionmaking.

Considered against the historical background, radio and television coverage of Senate proceedings is simply a logical extension of past and present methods of reporting Senate business to the people. Since the late 18th century, the Senate has had a public gallery open to all citizens and print media representatives. Television coverage was first permitted in the House in 1947 for the opening ceremonies of the 80th Congress, and in 1979, full television coverage of debate in that Chamber began. In the interim, the Senate has allowed television coverage of some committee hearings, permitted television broadcast of the swearing-in ceremony of Vice President Nelson Rockefeller in 1974, and authorized radio coverage of the 1977 debates on the Panama Canal treaties.

Thus, while full television and radio coverage of Senate debates would be a significant broadening of past precedents in this House of Congress, it would not be a totally new experience for most Senators, nor a radical departure from past practices. Rather, with the widespread, increasing dependence of the American people on television and radio for information about governmental actions, it is simply high time for the Senate to allow live broadcasts of its proceedings over the airwaves.

As I indicated at the outset of my statement, the authorization of radio and television coverage of Senate business is an appropriate means of reaffirming that our National Government is a representative democracy responsible to the people. The citizens of this great Nation have a right to know how the legislative business of their U.S. Senate is being transacted. Approval of this measure would protect and enhance that basic right, thereby bringing more openness to the legislative process.

The opening of Senate Chamber business to airwave broadcasts would be an important step in the process of bringing Government into the sunshine, as this objective is often captioned, but it is not an end in itself. Rather, by furthering the right and need of the public to have prompt, direct information pertaining to Senate business, we will enhance the knowledge of our citizenry and thereby improve the quality of our Government. Sometimes, perhaps, Senators have a tendency to think of themselves as self-employed, independent decisionmakers, when in fact we are all privileged holders of a precious public trust bestowed on us by our respective electorates.

Our bosses are all of the taxpayers and citizens of the State we represent and, because of our national responsibilities, of the entire Nation. We are accountable to them for how we vote, what we say, and even what we may not say or neglect to do in this Chamber when we may have a responsibility to act. By opening the legislative process in the Senate Chamber to the scrutiny of radio and television coverage, the fundamental objectives of first, raising the public's level of political and governmental knowledge, and second, making Senators more accountable to the people they represent, both will be better served. As a result, the integrity and quality of our representative democracy will be improved.

Mr. President, another reason why I believe radio and television coverage of Senate proceedings should be authorized is that over time it will improve, in my opinion, the public image of the Senate and engender greater confidence in and respect for Senators. All of us are familiar with the embarrassingly low regard of the public for the Senate, and Congress generally, as an institution. We, as a body, definitely have an image problem. A portion of this image problem no doubt stems from the too widespread belief that the Senate prefers to operate in a close, secretive fashion, where deals can be cut and principles compromised in the name of political expediency.

It is a harsh indictment, and whether it is accurate and deserved or not, it is a problem with which we must cope. Frankly, it is my hope and belief that opening the Senate Chamber to radio and television coverage will dispel some of the erroneously held notions about the Senate, as well as encourage Senators to act in a more statemanslike manner.

Finally, Mr. President, I believe this action will, in the long run, improve the quality of debate and decisionmaking in the Senate. On this point, as on some of the others I have made, I recognize that there are those who may disagree. Opponents of this resolution contend that television coverage will lead to more and longer debates, grandstanding before the cameras, and undue emphasis on the before-camera communicative abilities of Senators, in relation to other more important attributes of an effective legislator.

There is probably some truth in these contentions, but on the whole, I believe the impact of television and radio coverage will be positive. After an initial period of adjustment, Senators will not be unduly cognizant of the live reporting over television and radio of their statements and Senate actions. This seems to have been the experience in the House of Representatives. Yet, the increased scrutiny of the microphones and cameras should cause Senators to come to the floor more fully prepared for any remarks they may make and for votes to be cast. Senators should become more attentive to the business in the Senate Chamber, including actual presence during debates, in relation to committee and personal office business. In short, actions in the Senate Chamber itself should take on increased importance in the total Senate lawmaking scheme, reversing what many believe has been an unhealthy trend toward committee and behind-the-scenes domination of the legislative process.

It is my hope and belief, Mr. President, that out of it all will come better laws—laws that are more understandable, concise, and, most of all, more in keeping with the will of the people, as expressed through their elected senatorial representatives. Similarly, it is my hope and opinion that adoption of this measure will help make Senators more responsive and accountable to the public will. For these reasons, I am glad to lend my support to this resolution. I hope the Senate will see fit to adopt it.

Mr. BENTSEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, at a time when unemployment in this country is approaching 9 percent, when we have sky-high interest rates, when we are talking about a budget deficit that may go over $100 billion, there are some who would think that to have a lengthy debate about spending $5 million for the self-aggrandizement of Senators would be pretty trivial.

I am opposed to Senate Resolution 20. I am opposed to spending at least $5 million to televise debates on the floor to a rather limited audience.

I will, however, support Senator FORD's proposals to begin immediate radio coverage of these debates at a cost that would be about 3 percent of the cost of television.

As one of those Senators who is not quite ready to see my colleagues forever in "pancake" on the floor of the U.S. Senate, as a Senator who is not quite ready to see some kind of makeup chair in the cloakrooms, I just do not think this is the thing we ought to be doing. I think it is a bad idea.

I would like to take just a few minutes to explain why I think it it is a bad idea. First of all, it is an expensive proposition, at least $5 million, and that is just at the outset. Did you ever see any one of these Government programs or projects that Congress proposes that ever came in at less than the proposed cost? Obviously in the end, they will be talking about a figure that will be substantially more than the initial cost estimates. Second, I think televised proceedings could have a very profound and, potentially, adverse implication for the way we conduct our business in the U.S. Senate. Some may argue that $5 million is not a lot of money these days, particularly if it gives millions of Americans the opportunity to witness Senate debates.

I just do not buy that argument. Last summer we asked the American people to sacrifice; and we cut the budget by over $40 billion. By all accounts, the budget that is being submitted now to the Congress is going to call for even greater sacrifices in areas that are going to be hurt the most, areas like education, job training, health care, retirement benefits. To say this is a time of tough fiscal austerity is an understatement. We are all cutting back. The Senate committees have cut back by over $5 million.

I really do not see how at a time like this we can go to the American people and ask for $5 million of their hard-earned tax dollars so that a few of them can see the Senate in action and in living color. I would much rather see that money spent on keeping the Texas Employment Commission offices open in Texas. I would rather spend it trying to find people jobs at a time when the unemployment rate in the United States, including Texas, continues to increase.

I would much rather see that money spent on health care for the elderly; or to provide school lunches or immunizations for our children. Those funds could be used to buy approximately 4.2 million school lunches or 5 million immunization shots, which would protect our children from polio, mumps, measles, diphtheria, and tetanus. I would rather see the money spent for something like that—something really productive.

I support opening up our debates to public scrutiny. We have got a gallery filled with newspaper people—filled normally. If we had not been debating this resolution for so many days we would have a lot more up there today than we have now. But that shows, I think, how they too feel we are getting the appropriate coverage.

I think the best way to have gavel-to-gavel coverage is through radio. The Panama Canal debates proved that. It was an effective way to do it.

Only about one-quarter of American homes are hooked up to cable TV and most of those are the well-to-do. So the potential audience for Senate TV is limited, and it is skewed right from the outset.

But during the daytime, when most of our debates take place, millions of Americans from all walks of life have access to a radio. If we want to throw sunlight into the Senate, radio is the way to proceed. It is the best way to reach the most people at the least cost to the taxpayers. The installation estimate of those costs, would be less than $150,000.

I also agree with my distinguished colleague from Louisiana, who has been here a lot longer than most of us and is an acknowledged expert as to how this Senate works. He suggests that television could introduce subtle but significant changes in the debate in the U.S. Senate. I keep hearing people refer to the House and how it works in the House. This is not the House. This is not a place where you have to debate in 5 minutes. This is not a place where everybody goes down to the well and makes his speech. We have a different set of rules here. This is a place of free and extemporaneous debate, in general. Sometimes it is from a text which we have prepared to help us collect our thoughts and give them more precise meanings. But, I would hate to see unlimited debate in the Senate become a thing of the past.

As we have it now, the press has access to the gallery and to individual Senators. We have ample access to the television cameras. If they think we have said something that is noteworthy of going on TV they can call you up to repeat that and give it to the American people.

The American people have a right, Mr. President, I think to unlimited speech and debate, and I just think this resolution would be its death knell. That is what the framers of the Constitution anticipated and intended when they incorporated words like that into our Constitution. It is a right which has been preserved for the American people for over 200 years, and it ought to be continued for the American public, and I think it would be the end of unlimited speech and debate if you adopt this resolution.

So, Mr. President, my basic objection to Senate television is this: Why pay $5 million to reach those few people who are hooked up to cable and inclined to watch the Senate when we can transmit live, gavel-to-gavel by radio to a far larger potential audience for only 3 percent of the TV cost?

I urge my colleagues to give careful consideration to the wisdom of spending $5 million at this time and under these circumstances for Senate television. I think that is precisely the sort of waste and excess that we so rightly criticize in other Government programs. There is a better, cheaper, more effective choice available. It is called radio, and I urge my colleagues to defeat Senate Resolution 20 and move promptly to provide live radio coverage of Senate proceedings.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTSEN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, has the Senator heard the figures that were used about the time that the House used on television compared to the time that was used in the House prior to television? Have you heard some discussion of that in this body?

Mr. BENTSEN. No, I have not.

Mr. LONG. There were some figures used, so let me just refer to that argument, because this is a matter that Senators should know and should carefully consider.

The argument has been made that the House was in session less hours its first session on television than it was the previous session under President Jimmy Carter.

Those figures overlook facts that ought to be made available.

For example, in the House, you do not have unlimited debate, as the Senator knows. The Rules Committee determines how long a measure may be debated. It allows both sides a certain amount of time and then it provides how many amendments can be considered and how many motions can be made and, in effect, after a certain period of time, when the vote will occur. The Senator is familiar with that, of course. He served in the House.

Mr. BENTSEN. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Members of the House point out to me that to simply compare the number of hours the House was in session 1 year with the number of hours the House was in session another year is meaningless. If you want a meaningful comparison, you must compare the number of substantive issues that were taken up and discussed and voted upon and then divide the number of issues decided by the number of hours in session and you can see whether you were more efficient or less efficient.

On that basis, the average issue took about 1 hour more to dispose of, the average substantive bill took about 1 hour more to dispose of under television than it did prior to television.

But may I say to the Senator that that does not appear to be the meaningful issue, because even so that is under the control of a rule set down by the Rules Committee and the Members only have a certain amount of time available to speak.

The meaningful comparison would be how does those things that Members are privileged to do compare, where they have the privilege, to how it was under the previous situation. The one thing that most people can do in the House is to obtain consent to make a 1-minute speech and make a RECORD insertion. For that purpose, it is my understanding, based on a study that has been made and passed on to me, comparing March 1976, 1977, and 1978, before television, with the number that was given after television coverage began, there was an increase of 120 percent, from an average of 126 to an average of 280. And at another period the comparison was made in September and the same type thing tended to be the case.

So there you have an increase, in the areas where the Speaker cannot very well decline the right to let someone make a 1-minute speech, of 120 percent. And that is only when a small percentage of the American homes receive the television live. How much more would it be when you have 10 times that many homes that receive television live across the country?

Furthermore, in the Senate, we have unlimited debate. Senators can speak as long as they want to.

Let me ask the Senator, is there any doubt in his mind—when we were speaking about the reduction of the minimum benefit for these dear old people under social security, only a few Senators spoke on the matter. I believe on this side only about one Senator carried the burden of debate, perhaps one or two other Senators helped him. Is there any doubt in the Senator's mind that those of us who were opposing that reduction in those minimum benefits, the overwhelming majority of Senators would want to say something about that if it was on live television?

Mr. BENTSEN. Of course they would, and they would do it. And yet, as we all know, virtually everyone had made up their minds and knew exactly what they wanted to do. We had already voted in the Finance Committee and we had taken our stands. But we again would have had to come over here and make our points on the chance that you are going to be on the 6 o'clock news or you are going to be seen back home defending that particular issue. And I would also guess that you would get an awful lot less work done back in the committees or back in your offices with your constituents under that kind of a situation.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the Senator yield on that very point?

Mr. BENTSEN. I yield for a question.

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Senator would yield for a question, I would appreciate it. I regret that the Senator from Texas opposes this resolution because I think he, himself, could do so much for the Senate if the proceedings were televised. Look at him. He is tall and lean, as a Texan ought to be. His face is a youthful, yet mature face, as a Senator's face ought to be.

Mr. BENTSEN. Never mind the question, go ahead with the speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATHIAS. His face is expressive. When he talks, his eyebrows rise and fall. He shows intensity and conviction. All of this could come across on television; none could be enjoyed on radio. But my question is this:

Mr. BENTSEN. Let me say, first, to the Senator from Louisiana that I may have to rethink my position. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATHIAS. Now, the Senator from Louisiana has used some figures about the time spent on a measure. And he says it does not really matter that the last year the House was without television they were in session for 1,016 hours and that every year since then they have been in session less than that, because he said it is the amount per measure. Well, according to our figures, over in the House they have shown a very normal cyclical pattern where, between the first and second sessions, you get some difference.

The average number of hours per measure in the House, beginning with the first session of the 95th Congress, was 1.2 hours. I believe these are the figures of the Senator from Louisiana. The second session, 1.15 hours. In the 96th Congress, the first session, 1.46; and then the second session, 1.1 hours. In the 97th Congress, first session, 1.5 hours per measure.

But what the Senator did not do is to make the same kind of comparison with the Senate. And it is interesting that where television is not even involved in the Senate, you get the same kind of a pattern. Hours per measure in the Senate, first session of the 95th Congress, 1.6 hours; second session, 1.5 hours; 96th Congress, first session, 1.8 hours; second session, 1.4 hours. And in the 97th Congress, 2.2 hours in the first session.

So you get this kind of variation which would indicate that television really has not affected either the length of the session or the amount of time spent on an issue. And that, I think, is an extraordinary and objective test, which proves the case.

So, I am just wondering, in my question to the Senator, whether he sees any kind of pattern there that can be clearly traced to the impact of television?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in view of the fact the Senator did not bring the subject up, I would suggest that we compare the figures and I believe as this debate goes along I will have a chance to prove my point.

But let me ask the Senator further: Has he noticed, when a committee is being covered on live television and when the camera is beaming out to the public, what is being done and what is transpiring before a committee on live television? Every Senator there tends to ask a question when his turn comes. And usually if he is called on to interrogate the witness for 5 minutes, he takes his whole 5 minutes; if he has 10 minutes, he tends to take his whole 10 minutes.

Mr. BENTSEN. He takes it all himself. It is like the question that my friend from Maryland was posing—it will be a speech and it will use up the full 5 minutes. What I have also noted is that when you have control, when you are the majority, then you have a big advantage, because we line up on the left and on the right depending on the party. I notice where they put the cameras. When we are in charge, we put the cameras opposite us so they shine on us. And the Republicans are now in charge, so they move the cameras to the other side so they will shine on them. That is the sort of thing that worries me about what might happen in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Senator would yield, I think he could be reassured on that score. We have discussed here earlier today just exactly who would regulate the cameras. I have no fixed ideas. The resolution calls for the Rules Committee to provide for the regulation. But we could have the joint leadership or we could have the full Senate make the recommendation. But the cameras, once in the Senate, are not going to be move around with any partisan changes here.

The cameras will be fixed. They will deal with Senators as individuals and not as members of a party. They will be operated by Senate staff. They will not be panning the room looking for somebody who is in deep reflection, eyes closed, or someone who is telling an anecdote to his neighbor in apparent disrespect to the speaker.

It is the record. It is, as the Senator from New York said, the electronic Hansard, the electronic record of what is happening here. It will certainly reflect in an electronic mode what is reflected with paper and ink in the printed RECORD.

I do not believe that those concerns the Senator has expressed are really contemplated or could happen under the resolution that is before the Senate.

Mr. BENTSEN. I would hope the Senator is right. All I can refer to is the actual experience in the House and Senate committees as to the placing of the cameras and how a majority, both Democrats and Republicans, when they are in the majority, have a tendency—not a tendency, but they do it—to put it on the side that is going to show them. I have a great deal of respect for that side of the aisle, but I do not have to sit over there to get myself on TV.

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Senator will yield, I recall when I was a member of the General Assembly in Maryland, I believe at that time—and I may be wrong about the exact figure—there were five Republicans in a house of 126. It was the lowest Republican representation in the General Assembly of Maryland since the Civil War.

Mr. BENTSEN. I would say to the Senator that he was among the finest representatives the Republicans have had in that legislative body.

Mr. MATHIAS. The Senator is charitable today.

The then mayor of Baltimore, a former Member of the Congress, Thomas D'Alessandro, Jr., came to me one day and said, "You know, if I were in your position"—and I am reminded of this by the Senator's concern about the rights of the minority—"I would get up every day and I would say, 'Mr. Speaker, I fight alone but I fight on.' It would not really matter what you said after that. Just say it every day." Then he said, "Sooner or later, people will listen to you."

Actually, this is going to enhance the position of the minority because there will be a camera which will be available to every speaker. It will give the minority proportionately a greater opportunity to be on camera than the majority because the competition will be less, just as I had the opportunity, as a member of the minority side in a house of 126. I had greater opportunities to be heard than if I had been 1 of an evenly split house of 63.

Mr. BENTSEN. I will say to my friend as long as we in the minority, are going to be operated on, I want to be sure that the knife is in the hands of a friendly surgeon.

Mr. MATHIAS. An impartial surgeon.

Mr. BENSTEN. But I have not seen impartiality on the part of either one of these parties.

I remember that story by my friend down in south Texas who was about to open up a catfish that he had just caught. He said, "Little catfish, don't you wiggle. All I am going to do is gut you."

I do not want to see that sort of thing happen to us here.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BENTSEN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator, having served in both bodies, the House and the Senate, and having the excellent education that he has, a thorough understanding of what this Government is all about, understands what the functions of the Senate were intended to be.

As the Senator knows, Senators serve 6-year terms, with only one-third of the Senators running every 2 years, compared to the House where all Members must run every 2 years.

Congress was established in that fashion for a reason. I am sure the Senator very well agrees that the reason was that the Senate is expected to do their difficult chore of making decisions which sometimes are not the popular decisions, but decisions that must be done in the public interest, sometimes to save this country. The Senate is entrusted with that painful duty of being expected to stop bad legislation from being enacted which may be popular at the moment, just as the Senate has the burden of ratifying treaties, where sometimes the treaty might not be a popular treaty or might be subject to a great deal of misunderstanding.

To put it in a word, is not the Senate expected to exercise statesmanship?

Mr. BENTSEN. Yes; I would say to the Senator, that is obviously true. It is obvious that that is the reason the 6-year term was given to Senators, that they would be away from the political heat for a period of time, longer than the House, trying to do some things that at times are not popular but which are important to the country. I think that makes this body significant when you are talking about legislative bodies around the world.

Mr. LONG. I would ask the Senator this: If one must do the painful chore of explaining the unpopular side of the issue and standing firm for the unpopular side of the issue, knowing that that is what is best for the country and hopefully time will prove one right in that regard, does the Senator see anything about TV coverage that would help or tend to encourage statesmanship, or does he think it would tend to tilt the Senate toward the side of expediency?

Mr. BENTSEN. I think those conditions would make it more burdensome on a Senator.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LONG. I do not have the floor.

Mr. MATHIAS. I will propound a question to either Senator. Is it being suggested that statesmen can only work in secret?

Mr. BENTSEN. I must say that we have an informed and sophisticated press up here which hardly could be classified as trying to suppress the news of the Senate. In turn, we are talking about putting it on radio from gavel to gavel and that will reach many millions of people in our land. So nobody is talking about doing anything in secret.

Mr. LONG. For example, is it not true that every word we utter in debate is taken down?

Mr. BENTSEN. It is.

Mr. LONG. And it is made available in the RECORD for everyone.

Can the Senator see where a person is seeking to make something secret when he stands here and makes a speech that is going to be published and sent throughout the entire United States in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and which is before the news media?

Mr. BENTSEN. I think it is very obvious that this is a very open body.

Let me say that I am enjoying this exchange but I have a number of constituents waiting for me in my office. If we had this on TV, I might not be so quick to go back and listen to some of the things they have to say. I would continue to try to make sure the camera was on me.

With that in mind, if Senators will go ahead and continue this debate and let me get back to my constituents, I think I shall.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has just added another urgent reason why we should have this resolution adopted immediately, to prolong his presence on the floor.

Clearly, Mr. President, what the resolution will do is portray in a more vivid and more accurate fashion what occurs on the floor on the U.S. Senate. While that is true, certainly, it is merely doing a better job of reporting, as the Senator from Louisiana has said, than is already being done in the form of print. I hope the Senate will adopt the resolution.

Mr. President, a minute ago, I quoted certain figures relating to time in session of the Senate and the House of Representatives in the 95th, 96th, and 97th Congresses as well as the average hours spent on each measure adopted. I ask unanimous consent that a table showing these figures in some detail be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIME IN SESSION AND MEASURES PASSED

Congress and session	Senate				House
	Days	Hours	Measures passed	(Hours per measure passed)	Days	Hours	Measures passed	(Hours per measure passed)
95th:
1st	178	1,144	705	1.6	174	882	734	1.2
2d	159	1,365	891	1.5	149	1,016	881	1.15
96th:

97th: 1st	165	1,080	488	2.2	163	653	433	1.5

[1] Television began in March.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, since the question has been raised as to the impact of the use of television on the volume of work, the volume of hours, the volume of speeches that will be given, I also submit for the RECORD and ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point a compilation of figures relating to the number of pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that were required to report the proceedings of the 95th, 96th, and 97th Congresses.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD PAGES

Congress and session	Senate	House	Extensions [1]
95th:
1st	19,974	13,082	7,547
2d	19,670	13,847	6,035
96th:
1st	19,560	12,524	6,398
97th: 1st	15,785	9,931	6,008

[1] It is estimated that the House accounts for at least 95 percent of the material in the "Extensions" section.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. The Senator from Louisiana is almost a quorum in himself, but not quite.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be an additional period for the transaction of routine morning business, to extend not past 4:30 p.m., in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I understand that there are certain other items of business that might be transacted. I observe the Senator from New Mexico is on the floor, and I yield the floor so that he may seek recognition.

Mr. SCHMITT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE LIFE AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF DR. ARTHUR M. BUECHE

Mr. SCHMITT. Madam President, science and technology is the future of the United States of America and literally, I believe, as many do, is the future of mankind. With the exception of our initial major national milestone, the formation of this great land as a free Republic, our national milestones have been milestones of achievement based on drawing from this reservoir of science and technology that a free people have created.

Science and technology does come from the people, and today I am pleased to submit, along with my distinguished colleagues, Senators BAKER, D'AMATO, JACKSON, MOYNIHAN, and RIEGLE, a resolution to honor Dr. Arthur M. Bueche, who died recently.

Art Bueche was an outstanding scientist, engineer, and executive. He has been a leader in converting laboratory achievements and scientific knowledge into products benefiting mankind. He rendered valuable services as an adviser to numerous Federal agencies including the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the National Science Foundation, the U.S. Air Force, and the National Bureau of Standards. Recently, he served as Cochairman of the President-elect's Advisory Task Force on Science and Technology. At the time of his death on October 22, 1981, he was senior vice president—corporate technology, General Electric Co.

Madam President, I send to the desk at this time a resolution to commemorate the life and accomplishments of Dr. Arthur M. Bueche and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 314) to commemorate the life and accomplishments of Dr. Arthur M. Bueche.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Madam President, these is no objection from this side, and the matter has been cleared previously.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SCHMITT. Madam President, this is a particularly timely honor for Art Bueche. I and many others in Congress as well as in the Nation's Capital and elsewhere in the country are examining very, very closely the base of science and technology and people associated with science and technology from which we must draw the solutions to many, if not most, of our national problems.

Art Bueche dedicated his life to science, engineering, and the progress of science and technology in general.

It is my hope that my colleagues will join me in passing this resolution today honoring a great man and an outstanding American.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 314) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, read as follows:

S. RES. 314

Whereas, Dr. Arthur M. Bueche, as one of the outstanding scientists and engineers in the United States, made substantial and enduring contributions over his lifetime to science, industry, Government service, and education;

Whereas, the United States continues to face an era of increasingly complex problems depending on scientific and technological progress for solutions;

Whereas, Dr. Bueche devoted his individual research efforts in the field of material sciences pioneering the development of synthetic rubber and silicons, obtaining many patents, publishing dozens of outstanding papers and reports, and was an active participant and officer in numerous scientific and technical societies.

Whereas, Dr. Bueche has been widely praised for his management skills in industrial research, resulting in breakthroughs in the fields of electronics, materials science and energy, and implementing innovative approaches for rapidly converting laboratory achievements into products benefitting mankind. Among these products are: an advanced computer-directed axial tomography X-ray (CAT) scanner, stronger and safer plastic materials, extraordinarily hard materials for metal cutting tools, more energy-efficient lamps, and fuel conserving electric generating equipment;

Whereas, Dr. Bueche has contributed to the field of education as a member of the Board of Trustees of the Rensselear Polytechnic Institute, Albany Medical College, and the Hudson-Mohawk Valley Association of Colleges and Universities, as a member of the Visiting Committees at Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Harvard University, and as an advisor to his alma mater, Cornell University;

Whereas, Dr. Bueche has rendered valuable Government service as a frequent witness before many Congressional committees, as an advisor to the National Science Foundation, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, United States Air Force, National Bureau of Standards, and most recently as Co-chairman of the President-Elect's Advisory Task Force on Science and Technology:

Whereas, Dr. Bueche has received the recognition of his peers by election to the National Academy of Sciences and the National Academy of Engineering, and selection for the Industrial Research Institute Medal, and the Fahrney Gold Medal of the Franklin Institute; and

Whereas, Dr. Bueche displayed exemplary personal qualities, leadership skills, devotion to public service, and a rare combination of knowledge and abilities demonstrated over the course of his lifetime: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Senate honors the memory and expresses its appreciation for the accomplishments and outstanding contributions to society of Dr. Arthur M. Bueche.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DIRECTING SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL TO INTERVENE IN CONSUMER ENERGY COUNCIL OF AMERICA, INC., ET AL. AGAINST FEDERAL ENERGY REGULATORY COMMISSION, ET AL.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, it has been brought to the attention of the leadership on both sides by counsel for the Senate that there is a certain case now on appeal from the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to the Supreme Court of the United States entitled "Consumer Energy Council of America, Inc., et al. against Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, et al.," and that certain fundamental interests of the Congress and of the Senate may be involved in the disposition of that case.

The statutes provide for a leadership group to advise Senate legal counsel on matters involving the Senate as a party or otherwise in litigation. That group has met and determined that it is their recommendation that the Senate should intervene as a party in that litigation.

In order to authorize that, Madam President, I send to the desk a resolution for myself and for Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 315) to direct Senate legal counsel to intervene in Consumer Energy Council of America, Inc., et al. v. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, et al., Nos. 80-2184, 80-2312 (D.C. Cir.).

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. On January 29, 1982, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit handed down a major ruling on the constitutionality of legislative vetoes, holding that a legislative review provision of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 violates the principle of separation of powers and article I of the Constitution. This resolution will direct the Senate Legal Counsel to move to intervene in this lawsuit in the name of the Senate to seek review of this decision.

In 1978, after a 10-month conference, the House and Senate succeeded in resolving the extraordinarily difficult issue of natural gas deregulation. An important element in the compromise legislation finally adopted by Congress was incremental pricing of natural gas. Incremental pricing was so novel and controversial a concept that the key to its adoption was dividing its implementation into a limited first phase, and an expanded second phase. This expanded second phase would go into effect only if neither House of Congress disapproved a proposed rule which the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission would submit to Congress. In May 1980, after the Commission itself expressed strong reservations about its proposal for the second phase, the House adopted a resolution disapproving the Commission's proposal.

The controversy over incremental pricing concerns the extent to which the costs of new natural gas should be passed on to industrial users of gas. The Senate joined with the House in establishing the procedure by which that question should be determined, but it has not, and would not by this resolution, take a position on the merits of this dispute over natural gas pricing. Rather, the Senate's interest in this litigation is over the procedures which the Congress may establish to assure that critical decisions of national energy policy, and other significant matters, can be made in a timely and efficient manner without abdicating the responsibility that must be ultimately carried by elected representatives.

After the House disapproved the Commission's proposal, several groups of gas users challenged the constitutionality of the statutory provision for congressional review. They contended that the provision for legislative review should be invalidated and that the court should require the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to implement the proposed rule. The Justice Department appeared to present the executive branch position that statutory provisions for legislative review are unconstitutional. The Senate appeared in the court of appeals as an amicus curiae pursuant to Senate Resolution 121, adopted May 6, 1981, and filed a joint brief with the Speaker of the House in defense of the statute.

In its January 29, 1982, decision, the court of appeals acknowledged that it was the intent of Congress that an expansion of incremental pricing go into effect only if neither House disapproved it. It concluded, however, that Congress would have enacted incremental pricing, including provisions for its expansion, even without the legislative review provision. On the constitutional issue, the court of appeals ruled that the provision for legislative review in the Natural Gas Policy Act was unconstitutional.

The court acknowledged that previous judicial decisions on challenges to legislative review had been framed in a limited fashion. There are currently in efffect over 50 statutes with provisions for legislative review by one or both Houses of Congress. These provisions have been used by Congress and Presidents to reach accommodations concerning national security and foreign affairs, the budget, international trade, and energy. Quite understandably, therefore, courts have been reluctant to rule broadly in favor of either the Congress or the executive branch in the few cases which have been decided previously. The court of appeals nevertheless rendered a sweeping ruling that brings into question many provisions for legislative review.

Further proceedings either in the court of appeals, such as a suggestion of rehearing en banc, or in the Supreme Court, may be necessary in this litigation. The sweeping nature of the constitutional approach of the court of appeals creates a potential for uncertainty as to the validity of numerous other statutes. Also, the court's decision that it may require the Commission to implement the gas pricing rule even though the Congress intended that no rule should go into effect, if disapproved, raises serious questions under the separation of powers. It is beyond the ability and the role of the judiciary to speculate what the Congress would have intended, apart from what it enacted into law. The choice of alternatives to legislative review would require policy judgments that only the Congress may make.

Since May 1981, the Senate has participated in this case as amicus curiae. To file motions and petitions for further proceedings the Senate must now appear as a party. The Senate's appearance in this case as a party would be consistent with the pattern in the case now in the Supreme Court concerning the legislative veto, Immigration and Naturalization Service against Chadha (Nos. 80-1832, 80-2170, and 80-2171). In that case, the Senate appeared first as amicus curiae in the court of appeals and then, after the ruling by the court of appeals, intervened as a party to petition for rehearing and for Supreme Court review.

Section 706(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 authorizes the Senate to direct the Senate legal counsel to intervene in actions in the name of the Senate when the powers and responsibilities of the Congress under the Constitution are placed in issue. The joint leadership group has agreed that this is such a case and supports this resolution.

Madam President, I think no further explanation is necessary. Senate legal counsel is available for the inquiry of any Senator, and if the minority leader has nothing he wishes to add, I am prepared for the Senate to dispose of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 315) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution (S. Res. 315) together with its preamble is as follows:

Whereas, by S. Res. 121, 97th Congress, 1st Session (1981), the Senate directed the Senate Legal Counsel to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in Consumer Energy Council of America, Inc., et al. v. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, et al., Nos. 80-2184, 80-2312 in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit;

Whereas, on January 29, 1982, the Court of Appeals ruled that the legislative review provision in section 202(c) of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3342(c) (Supp. III 1979)), violated Article I of the Constitution and the principle of separation of powers;

Whereas, the Senate as amicus curiae may not have the procedural opportunities available to a party to seek review of this decision and intervention as a party would enable the Senate to do so;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(c), 706(a), and 713(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 (2 U.S.C. 288b(c), 288e(a), and 288*l*(a) (Supp. III 1979)), the Senate may direct its Counsel to intervene in the name of the Senate in any legal action in which the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution are placed in issue: Now therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to intervene in the name of the Senate in Consumer Energy Council of America, Inc., et al. v. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, et al., Nos. 80-2184, 80-2312.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

DAY OF NATIONAL CELEBRATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the next resolution by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 130) designating February 22, 1982, the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, a "Day of National Celebration."

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. WARNER. Madam President, I rise today in support of Senate Joint Resolution 130, designating February 22, 1982, the 250th anniversary of the birth of George Washington, a day of national celebration.

George Washington was one of our Nation's greatest leaders. He possessed considerable wisdom, unflagging energy, profound faith in God, and a clear vision of our Nation's potential in the years and generations ahead.

Frequently Washington is referred to as the "Father of our country." This title, while perhaps a little exaggerated, is nonetheless appropriate when one considers Washington's leadership in America's quest for independence from the British and his inspiring leadership as both the President of the Constitutional Convention and the first President of the United States. He set the course for this Nation—a course charted in political stability unrivaled in the history of civilization.

George Washington was a great American and a great Virginian. He was a man who lived by his word, who professed virtue, conscience, good character, honesty, justice, and equality.

As important as his expression was in his day, the words of Washington hold meaning for all of us today. Who among us can quarrel with Washington that arbitrary power is most easily established on the ruins of liberty abused to licentiousness. Certainly his belief that to be prepared for war is the most effectual means of preserving peace has rung true through the ages and stands as a cornerstone of America's modern defense and foreign policy.

How fitting it is that just after America observed the battle at Yorktown last October—where representatives from the United States, France, and Great Britain gathered to pay tribute to Washington's last great battle of the Revolutionary War—America should now observe his 250th birthday with a day of national celebration.

The Senate joint resolution about which I speak today is but a small tribute to the enormous contribution George Washington made to our Nation. It is my hope, and I believe the hope of all Senators who join me in support of this resolution, that Washington's 250th birthday will be marked with ceremonies and activities appropriate for this national leader.

I wish to take note for the benefit of my colleagues of some of the organizations which are helping to coordinate these ceremonies. They include the George Washington Chapter of the Virginia Society; Sons of the American Revolution; the George Washington Birthday Celebration Commission; and the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union.

Madam President, I urge the passage of this Senate joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 130

ADDRESS BY SENATOR PETE DOMENICI BEFORE THE NATIONAL PRAYER BREAKFAST

Mr. NUNN. Madam President, I was privileged to hear a friend and colleague, Senator PETE V. DOMENICI, speak before the National Prayer Breakfast last week.

With insight and eloquence, Senator DOMENICI offered his personal thoughts on the love that binds families, communities and society together. His address was not only a perceptive analysis, but it also contained practical advice for improving the quality of our own lives and the life of our society.

Senator DOMENICI's remarks were enriching and moving. From the many complimentary comments I heard from those in attendance, I know that the audience shared my impression of his outstanding presentation.

Madam President, I believe that we can all benefit from reading and reflecting on Senator DOMENICI's message, and I recommend his thoughtful presentation to every Senator. I ask unanimous consent that his address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BEFORE ANNUAL PRAYER BREAKFAST BY SENATOR PETE V. DOMENICI, FEBRUARY 4, 1982

I must admit to a certain feeling of awe at my assignment today.

I am in awe not only of my assignment, but of you, distinguished visitors, and of the presence of the President and General Dozier.

Mr. President, you have heard me worry about the Federal budget so much that you may think that is what I talk about every time I open my mouth. Well, today I promise that I will not mention the budget. I want to talk about one of the few things that occupies me more than Federal Budgets—society and families and the love that binds society and families together.

As I began preparing this little talk, I wondered why anyone would have chosen me for such a task. Since I am neither a great leader, nor a great speaker, nor one learned in history or philosophy, nor a biblical scholar of any sort, I have to conclude that I was chosen because of my constant concern for my family and my broader concern for family and community life in the United States and the rest of the world.

What I say today may be said better by others, and probably has been. Indeed, the words of our Lord Jesus are more powerful than anything I might say here today. But I hope that no one among the mortal exceeds me in my sincerity.

Let me start with something of a confession.

I am not one who is always and invariably considerate. It is a struggle for me to be loving, to be forgiving, to do good to others. Preoccupied by my job and myself all too often, I find that I do not take the time, or make the effort, to love. I confess that even with my family I do not show the love I have.

At one time, I was bothered by this trait, and I guess I would not be mentioning it today if I were not still somewhat bothered about it. After all, I reasoned, how good could I be, how strong a witness could I be, if I had to struggle to show my love and be considerate of others?

As the Apostle Paul said in his first letter to the Corinthians, "Love is patient: Love is kind. Love is not jealous, it does not put on airs, it is not snobbish. Love is never rude, it is not self-seeking, it is not prone to anger: Neither does it brood over injuries. Love does not rejoice in what is wrong, but rejoices with the truth. There is no limit to love's forbearance, to its trust, its hope, its power to endure."

I was bothered by my own difficulty in feeling a love as unselfish as the love that Paul described, because my impression was that true religious feeling, or Christian love, would be spontaneous and constant. But, I have come to think, virtually all of us have to struggle to take the time to love and show love.

Indeed, the most important persons in the world may be those who, like all of us in this room, struggle to do good, against an inherently self-occupied, inward-looking nature.

Thomas a Kempis said, "There is no living in love without suffering." He is talking about bearing a cross, about living in love the way Jesus lived in love—choosing to love even though this choice means making personal sacrifices. There is no living in love without suffering. There is a world of wisdom in that.

I believe that struggle is the key to good works, the key to successful loving. In everyday terms, most people who do not put some real effort into it will not have a successful marriage, will not raise their children lovingly, and will not know all the joys that family can bring. And, if we do not extend our notion of family into a notion of our entire society as a family that needs our daily love, we are not doing what we should.

We all struggle in our own private ways to be better, more loving persons. But sometimes we are privileged to get a glimpse of how others struggle.

Once, my wife Nancy and I went to Russia. Through unofficial channels, we let it be known that we would like to meet members of the Soviet Union's clergy. Then one evening, at an elaborate dinner in the Kremlin for 700 to 800 people, we were presented to a Russian Orthodox priest. At first, he was very reluctant to talk to us, but bit by bit he opened up. Finally, he took us aside and told us of the difficulties he faced. And then, tears streaming down his face, he opened his shirt and showed us the cross around his neck. And he gathered us around him so that no one would see, and he prayed over us.

How much easier we have it: Yet it is that same private, personal struggle to express our love that keeps families together and keeps communities together, in spite of the many forces in today's society that make this a formidable task.

Loving is an act of will, perhaps the supreme act of will. And if one's will to love is strong enough, no power on earth can defeat it.

That this struggle is everywhere is evident.

Who here cannot remember the extraordinary faith, strength, and love shown by the family of General Dozier, when the General was going through his terrible ordeal in the hands of his kidnapers? And who here was not moved when we saw the pictures of the family's joyful reunion after so many dark and fearful days?

Earlier I said that I was ashamed that I was not always spontaneous in my caring. One of my closest and dearest friends from Albuquerque, who refuses to let me use her name, has shown me that even someone loving and considerate must work to show love. Because she has children, and a crazy schedule between her husband's work and her own burdens, it is easy for her expressions of love or consideration to be forgotten in the hubbub. So she makes an effort so that love might not be lost. Each day she does something special that she has planned the night before to show one of her children that she cares about him or her.

My friend realizes that if she merely depends on an emotional or spontaneous demonstration of love, the pressures of the day might never allow such an expression. From the start, she pledged to herself that she would avoid that. And, because she worked at it, love was shown and love grew.

As the Russian priest struggled to show his faith against all odds, as General Dozier's family showed their love when they could not even be sure that the General was alive, as my personal friend struggles each day to show her love despite her almost overwhelming schedule, so all of us must struggle to show love and to demonstrate it. We should assume that such love will be nameless, but that it shall be more powerful than any fame. We under-estimate our capacity for good, yet, we also under-estimate how much hard work being good and being loving requires.

I know that to put this event together today much work was necessary. This expression of love was no spontaneous event, but it is no less important for that. Love that comes spontaneously may be beautiful. But more beautiful still is the love that comes of diligence, caring, and effort.

Let me conclude by reiterating my thoughts on God's greatest gift, love. First, love at its highest contains more than mere emotion. It embodies struggle. It demands expression and will. Second, that love and struggle occur in silence or in places far from notice detracts not at all from its grace or its necessity. And, finally, each of us, as people who struggle to love, are the most important people alive. Without our struggle, without our love, without our work to overcome our failings, our families and our very society will cease to exist and the world may never be the place of grace and peace we so devoutly wish.

I do not want to start an organization to preserve the family or to combat the forces that tear at our society. I would much prefer that each of us—privately and individually—work at caring and loving so that no such organization is necessary.

What, in the end, is the purpose of our struggle? Of our love? It is, I believe, that we can all make a difference, all of us, great and small, famous and nameless. Indeed, only we can make a difference.

Yet, have we made a difference?

Too many in this land and abroad are hungry, too many lonely.

Too many neighborhoods exist, where people neglect each other.

Too many young people need counseling, and love, and simple friendship.

Too many prisoners sit in despair without hope.

Too many elderly lie unvisited in too many hospitals or nursing homes.

How can this be when so many tens of millions of us profess Christ? If we really witnessed, we could by ourselves make everyone celebrate life.

I am not impressed by the fact that many persons have filled out questionnaires saying they have found Christ. I am not impressed even by the large numbers who attend church regularly, although I am glad they do so.

I will be impressed when our words and our deeds combine to make this a land of strong families and strong communities and strong love.

And for those of us who might think such work beneath us, recall Christ's words: "For I was hungry and you gave me food. I was thirsty and you gave me drink. I was a stranger and you made me welcome; naked and you clothed me, sick and you visited me, in prison and you came to see me. Then the virtuous will say to him in reply, 'Lord, when did we see you hungry and feed you; or thirsty and give you drink? When did we see you a stranger and make you welcome; naked and clothe you; sick or in prison and go to see you?' And the King will answer, 'I tell you solemnly, in so far as you did this to one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did it to me.'"

We are the salt, the Bible says, that seasons everything. We must now go forth and season the world around us. If today our words add encouragement to those who hear, let us work that tomorrow our deeds will bring the celebration of life to millions more.

My prayer is that all of you and those millions who profess but are not here would do this.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY

Mr. NUNN. Madam President, on January 30, 1982, the United States celebrated the centennial anniversary of the birth of Franklin D. Roosevelt. In honor of this celebration, Kay Magenheimer of Carrollton, Ga., has composed an inspiring poem, "This Way!" which I would like to share with my colleagues.

During her career, Kay has composed several award winning poems. In 1964, the late Senator Kenneth B. Keating inserted her tribute to John F. Kennedy in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It was later published in a book by the U.S. Government, "John Fitzgerald Kennedy, Late a President of the United States." She recently won second prize in a national poetry contest for her tribute to Anwar Sadat.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to bring to the attention of the Senate this new poem. I ask that the poem be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS WAY!

This way!—to no less than St. George himself!—
Shouted the boy in boisterous play
As he roared down a hill
To slay "dragons" off a half-mooned shore.

This way! my son, Sara adjured
The child to the manor born,
Is how a gentleman is discovered:
Be caring, always, of the poor.

Franklin! This way! cried Eleanor
To her stricken husband, one fateful day:
Up! Up on your feet, even in braces,
Or you surely die!

This way! a President told a nation
He found freezing, selling apples
In the streets, stamping numbed feet,
Warming cold hands over ashcan fires:
"The only thing we have to fear is fear itself!"

Suddenly, out of a surprised sky,
Infamous bombs rained from the blue,
Destroying his proud ships;
Entombing, forever, their agonized crews.

Dismayed by the perfidious trick,
This man of peace
Dared to command, as chief: This way!
Then his rockets glared red over the Pacific

And—four days later—
Across the Atlantic
Where Italy and the bully of Europe
Threatened to bludgeon a crippled United States.

This way! Roosevelt cried out to St. George,
Whose banners were already aflame.

Joining lances, and helped
By yeomen, subterranean and brave.
They slashed through the Mediterranean boot.
And from the sundered shores of France
Enroute to the dragon's lair,
Freed Europe from its gallows tree.
Now with victory scenting the very air,
But with its triumphant flags yet unfurled,
This way! said God to the President
And quietly, the man went Home.
A swell of grief engulfed his nation
And the world. And concentration camps,
Where—so close to freedom—all hurled themselves
Against their blackened walls, and wept
For this man forever blessed
For his words still lingering on his lips:
Freedom to speak and seek a God of one's own
Freedom from want, freedom from fear.
And for his alarm:
Abate hate! Cast off excessive arms!
Every nation has the right to peace,
To live without fear.
But today, not forty years
Since his great soul was heaven-borne,
A handful of men, crazed by power,
Decides who lives or dies. And no one cries * * *
Half the world dare not speak!
Half the world is denied its God.
Whole populations die of hunger
And everywhere, fear haunts every single soul.
This way! Roosevelt calls
Even now, from Eternity,
To a frightened, supine world:
Get up on your feet! Live!
Care for your innocents—
Your poor, your sick,
Your elderly and your young.
Your ignorant.
Protect all creatures and
Your planet! Remember,
It is your only home
Away from Home.
Be jealous of your liberty!
Be watchful of your government.
As I said before, it is better
That charity—not icy indifference—
Covers its occasional sin.
Destroy those arms
That tempt nations to aggression.
But keep your defenses up!
Above all,
Hold fast to your honor!
Then you will know,
My friends:
"The only thing you have to fear Is fear itself!"

YOU CAN'T GO BROKE MAKING A PROFIT

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, there is an old rural adage which says, "You can't go broke making a profit."

In 1982, farmers are finding that profits are all too few. Inflation, high interest rates, and the consequences of the grain embargo of January 4, 1980, are still being felt in the farm economy. In this economic environment, farmers deserve to have every possible marketing tool made available to them, so as to earn real profits in the marketplace.

One possible marketing tool which could be used by farmers is the trading of options on agricultural commodities. Options are contracts which provide the holder the right, but not the obligation, to buy or to sell a commodity at a specified price.

This means that a farmer, for example, could assure himself a minimum price for his grain at some future date certain. However, he would not lose the opportunity to sell this grain for more than the minimum price if cash prices rose above the minimum. The farmer would use this technique to try to lock in a price at which he could determine in advance would result in a profit. This could help the farmer immensely, since "you can't go broke making a profit."

It has been said that farming is a bigger gamble than Las Vegas, since the weather, the markets, and the Government are all unpredictable. Modern export-oriented agriculture, in other words, entails tremendous risks.

No one knows exactly how to calculate what level market prices may be in the future. But farmers and other entrepreneurs can determine their actual production costs. With this information, a producer can identify a price level which will pay his production costs and allow a reasonable return. He is protected then, even as he seeks higher actual market prices. In this way options could help to minimize risk, while still allowing an opportunity for reward.

Conversely, a miller or grain processor could use the option contract to lock in the price he pays for his raw materials. Such a system has potential benefits for farmers, processors, their lenders, and others in the industry.

The trading of options on farm commodities is currently prohibited by law because of abuses which occurred early in this century. This law, however, will come up for review in this session during the course of the reauthorization of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

Dr. Bruce Gardner, a noted agricultural economist at the University of Maryland, has written an article suggesting that the trading of agricultural options should be permitted. This article was published in the American Journal of Agricultural Economics in December 1977, and it should be reexamined today. The paper is scholarly in nature and the more technical provisions have been deleted in the excerpt provided here. It is an excellent article, in my view, and deserves careful consideration.

In addition, Dr. James Culver of the CFTC staff published an article in the January 1982 Commodities magazine which expresses his personal opinion on the trading of agriculture options.

I invite my colleagues and the public to thoughtfully review these articles and this subject. I am not necessarily convinced that the trading of agricultural options is desirable or that the ban on these options should be repealed at this time. Certainly, neither the Congress nor the CFTC should move prematurely on this matter.

I do believe, however, that farmers and the agricultural industry could use an additional opportunity for price protection and flexibility. I would hope that this could be achieved through the private sector. Options may offer that opportunity. I hope farmers will carefully evaluate this potential as a marketing tool that will help put producers in the driver's seat in obtaining fair prices—and profits—in the marketplace.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the excerpts of the articles be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM COMMODITY OPTIONS FOR AGRICULTURE

(By Bruce L. Gardner)

INDIVIDUAL RISK MANAGEMENT USING OPTIONS [1]

To review the terminology used, a "commodity option" is a contract to buy or sell a given quantity at an exercise price stated in the contract at the option of the purchaser of the contract. A contract conveying the right to buy is a "call" option. A contract conveying the right to sell is a "put" option. While an option confers the right to buy or sell, there is no obligation to do so. The right is not a free lunch, however, because the option must be paid for, whether it is exercised or not.

The person who receives payment, the other party to the contract, is said to "write" the option. He has a responsibility but no rights, for which he is paid. For a call (put) option, if the commodity price rises above (falls below) the exercise price by more than the "premium" paid (number of bushels in the contract divided by amount paid for the contract), the buyer of the option comes out ahead. If market prices do not rise this high (fall this low), the option writer gains. The gains of one party equal the losses of the other. [2]

[1] Trading is commodity option for most domestic farm products (notable exceptions being sugar and tobacco) is currently prohibited by the Commodity Exchange Act. The occasion is appropriate to consider the economics of options because of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission's proposed pilot program in options trading for some nonprohibited commodities, which could open the door to a general relaxation of restrictions on options.

[2] Brokerage or other transactions costs are for the most part ignored in this paper, so that the premium paid by an option buyer equals the receipts of the option writer. The analysis also is oversimplified in not considering the distinctions between "American" and "European" options (defined below) or between options written on a commodity and options written on a futures contract. The basic economics of options is not affected by these complications, although they involve important practical issues.

There are four roles an individual may play in options contracting: one can buy a call option, write a call option, buy a put option, or write a put option. Any of these actions may either increase or decrease an individual's exposure to price risk depending on his position in the underlying commodity, in futures, or in other options.

SOME OBJECTIONS TO OPTIONS MARKETS

The objections to legalizing options trading seem to center on the difficulty of policing this activity and on alleged undesirable effects on competing financial markets, particularly futures markets.

The idea that any activity should be prohibited because of the difficulty of policing or regulating it seems to me a weak one. Options trading is a voluntary capitalist act between consenting adults, in Robert Nozick's phrase. People ought to have the right to do these things unless it can be shown that serious external harm results. The regulatory view is that people ought to be forbidden from doing these things unless it can be shown that external good results. The regulatory view gains acceptance in the case of options because of the aura of disrepute about options trading. While options have the reputation of being inherently more purely speculative than futures trading, this reputation is undeserved. Options can be used either to increase or decrease risk of loss, just as futures or other wagers can. Options, however, are more flexible than futures, as illustrated above. Even for pure speculators, options can offer better controlled gambles than futures. In buying a call option the purchaser's maximum loss is limited by what is paid for the option. In futures trading or holding the commodity, losses are not so easily limited.

It is sometimes suggested that because the supply of speculative services is limited, the proliferation of options markets would reduce the viability of futures markets. This is an empirical issue that the Commodity Futures Trading Commission's proposed experimental program in options trading may help answer. Even if futures and options markets turned out to be such close substitutes that they could not coexist, can we be certain that the contest should be decided in advance in favor of futures?

It must be admitted, however, that there are many difficulties in establishing and facilitating trading in an options market and in keeping the public's trust in the integrity of such markets.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

The effects of options trading in farm commodities cannot be established other than hypothetically since there is so little empirical evidence. Nonetheless, there are good reasons to expect that commodity options for farm products would be useful financial instruments. They can be used by producers and users of commodities for risk management purposes more flexibly than futures or other forward sales. They also present advantages to speculators. Their use could improve efficiency in the market for the underlying commodities. An organized options market would yield information about the distribution of expected market price that cannot be obtained from futures prices. This information would be useful for decision making in the private sector and for such purposes as setting support prices in the public sector. Finally, over the long term options could permit a further movement toward less reliance on the general taxpayer for farm income and greater market determination of prices and resource allocation in agriculture, while still permitting farmers to obtain a degree of insurance against the income consequences of low prices (without locking themselves out of the benefits of high prices as a forward sale does).

However, the private benefits of centralized option trading could be insufficient to cover the costs of maintaining and transacting in such a market. If so, viable options markets will not develop. Nonetheless, there is no justification for stacking the deck against options by means of legislation. Indeed, the public good aspect of information generated by quoted option prices suggests that options trading on organized exchanges should be encouraged.

IT'S TIME TO RECONSIDER OPTIONS ON FARM COMMODITIES

(By James A. Culver)

Options trading on agricultural commodities, currently banned by Congress, should be reconsidered now because:

All issues concerning options trading in the United States have been fully and exhaustively examined:

Because economic uncertainty today demands every price-risk management tool that ingenuity can devise; and

Because the nation's contract markets have the strongest, most reliable self-regulatory systems in their history. Also, government has 60 years of accumulated experience in regulating futures markets that can be applied to impede the unscrupulous sales practices that haunted unregulated options.

According to a new program outlined by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, options would be traded on regulated exchanges. The plan would permit exchanges of offer options on commodity futures. This program would not allow options on agricultural commodities produced in the U.S.

MANAGE PRICE RISK

Commodity options have the potential to help businessmen and producers manage price risk, and in some instances, options can be a more appropriate vehicle than futures of this purpose.

Futures contracts expose their owners to two equal and opposite effects. While they offer their owner the opportunity to limit price risk if the market moves against him, they also limit profit opportunity for the commercial hedger. Any profit the hedger realizes in the futures market will be offset by losses in his opposite cash market position.

Options, however, provide an opportunity, not obligation, to buy or sell the underlying market. The holder of a sell (put) option limits his risk on the downside, but does not sacrifice his profit opportunities in the underlying market if prices rise.

Conversely, the purchaser of a call (buy) option limits his risk on the upside of the market, but may still take advantage of price declines in the underlying market. A premium is paid for this right.

If the option does not become profitable during its life, the holder need only let it expire and his cost is then limited to the premium already paid. With options traded on exchanges, it also would be possible to offset the option position in the market and recover a portion of the original premium depending on the time remaining in the option and the current value of the underlying asset.

Options sometimes can be a more attractive risk-management tool than futures contracts. The holder of an option has limited liability, that is, he can lose only the premium. Futures trading places the owner at risk for the full amount of any adverse price change that occurs while the futures contract is held.

For instance, in the early 1970s, soybean futures prices rose quickly from the $3 per bu. range to nearly $13. This was good news, indeed, for those with soybean inventories, unless they held a short futures position.

Because increases in prices cause losses in short futures, a soybean merchant who had acquired short futures position at $3 a bu. suffered successive losses as prices rose to around $13, wiping out the unexpected inventory profits.

FARE BETTER

But, if the same merchant had been able to acquire soybean option puts (the right to sell the underlying commodity) he might have fared much better. He would have paid a premium for them.

As prices climbed to roughly $13, the merchant simply would have abandoned the options, and except for the cost of the premium, could have enjoyed most of the unexpected inventory profit.

Options on agricultural commodities might better serve the legitimate business needs of agri-businessmen, including producers, who traditionally do not use futures. And, over time, options might also provide a private source of price protection that now is contained in certain farm programs.

In fact, agricultural commodity options offer several unique advantages for the producer and other agri-businessmen in managing price risk. One major advantage of options over futures is the limited risk involved in owning options.

To acquire an option, you pay a premium only once; that is the maximum possible loss on a purchased option. The premium gives the purchaser the right, not obligation, to buy or sell the underlying commodity at a fixed price (the strike price) on or before a future date (the expiration date).

However, if the purchase or sale of the commodity at the option's strike price would be unprofitable, the option may be abandoned. Therefore, options may be used as price insurance, that is, to assure a maximum or minimum price for an anticipated purchase or sale of the commodity in the future.

In order to use options as price insurance, a grain miller could purchase a call option (the right to buy the underlying commodity), thereby insuring a maximum price for the commodity. If the commodity's price were to rise above the option's strike price, the miller could exercise his option to buy and would receive a long position in the commodity.

However, if the commodity's price falls below the strike price, the miller can take advantage of the lower price in the spot market and abandon the option.

His only penalty is the primium. In either case the cost of this price insurance, the option premium, is determined when the option is purchased.

Options also may be used more economically than futures when the magnitude of risk is unclear. For example, a producer generally will be uncertain about his crop yield, but still may wish to protect himself against possible adverse price changes and a possible decline in crop value.

If he chooses futures to hedge his crop and establishes a larger futures position than needed, the producer actually becomes a speculator in the excess contracts, and is at serious risk. But, using options instead or as a complement to a short futures position taken on the minimum yield expected, the only risk run is that additional premiums may be paid.

Another advantage of owning options as a risk-management tool is the absence of margin calls. The option premium is paid when the option is purchased; no other payments need by made during the life of the option.

In contrast, during their life, futures positions may generate margin calls of large and uncertain magnitude which could cause cash-flow difficulties, particularly for producer-hedgers.

Options also can be used to manage risk by generating additional income. The holder of a cash commodity position can write an option on that position and receive the option premium (income) in return for granting the option.

BORNE BY WRITER

However, any losses on the commodity position greater than the option premium are borne by the writer. Gains on the position above the strike price go to the option purchaser, rather than the owner of the underlying commodity.

For example, a producer holding an unhedged inventory of sugar for future sale could grant a call option against that inventory in return for the option premium. If the price of the sugar declines below the call option's strike price, the producer would have to absorb the losses on the inventory position. This loss would be offset only by the amount of the premium received for granting the unexercised call option.

On the other hand, if the price of the commodity rose above the call strike price, the option could be exercised. The grantor would have to deliver the commodity at the option's strike price. In such a situation, the option writer foregoes any possible gain from the commodity price rise above the strike price in exchange for the premium income.

JOSEPH DIGENOVA

Mr. MATHIAS. Madam President, Joseph diGenova, the staff director and chief counsel of the Rules Committee and my former administrative assistant leaves the Senate today to become principal assistant U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia. He will leave behind him a host of friends and he will take with him the best wishes of all who knew him here on Capitol Hill.

A very wise Frenchman once said that "gratitude is the memory of the heart." It is also the least articulate of all emotions. This being so, I will simply ask my colleagues to join me in thanking Joe for many jobs well done in the service of each of us and of this institution which he knows and loves so well.

MORTGAGE REVENUE BOND PROGRAM REVISIONS STILL NEEDED

Mr. SASSER. Madam President, after 2 years of legislative initiatives and regulatory changes, with countless hours of analysis and negotiation in between, we seem to be nearing the point when the mortgage revenue bond program may be allowed to operate efficiently and effectively. The Treasury Department, in its wisdom, has partially adopted a few of the changes recommended in S. 1348, a bill I introduced last year to remedy the major problems in the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act of 1980. Some problems remain, however, and the Congress should consider further constructive changes in the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act of 1980.

These changes are in two areas that have been central to my own legislative program, and which—in the aftermath of the state of the Union message—are of increasing urgency to this administration: regulatory simplification and the return of decisionmaking authority to States and localities.

For example, the Tennessee Housing Development Agency was finally able to issue bonds in December which will assist in the construction or resale of about 1,700 dwellings. The paperwork involved in structuring that sale under exisiting requirements was staggering. But the need was there and the commitment was there, and the THDA saw it through. There is no need, however, to continue to require the burdensome, costly, and counterproductive regulatory straitjacket that threatened this bond issue from the start.

My colleague, Senator DURENBERGER, addressed some of these problems in his amendment to H.R. 4717, considered in the closing days of the last session. He is to be commended for his efforts to clear up some of the key questions in this matter. It has been my experience, in talking with bond counsel and with representatives of housing finance agencies across the country, however, that this amendment, unfortunately, does not go far enough in meeting a number of critical problems that remain for certain States.

Madam President, as we begin the 2d session of the 97th Congress, I want to set out again for my colleagues a sensible approach to getting the mortgage bond program moving again. We are, indeed, close to getting it in top running order, but there are additional constructive adjustments that can still be made through further legislation. As part of the preparation for that effort, I am enclosing an analysis by the bond counsel to the Tennessee Housing Development Agency explaining the effect of the Durenberger amendment and of THDA's December IRS ruling on the legislation I proposed last year. The points raised in this analysis demonstrate the need for passage of S. 1348, my legislation to amend the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Act of 1980.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the analysis by Hawkins, Delafield & Wood appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAWKINS, DELAFIELD & WOOD,
New York, N.Y., January 14, 1982.

Re Tennessee Housing Development Agency mortgage finance program bonds.

GRADY R. HAYNES,
Partner, Haynes Bros. Supply Co., Murfreesboro, Tenn.

DEAR GRADY: You have asked for my thoughts concerning two developments as they relate to the pending Duncan/Sasser Bills. The first is the amendment to the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act offered by Senator Durenberger and others in the Senate on December 16, 1981 (UP Amendment No. 812). The second is the revenue ruling issued by the Internal Revenue Service on December 24, 1981 with respect to the Agency's Single Family Program Bonds, 1981 Series A. Both of these have an impact on the Duncan/Sasser Bills as described below.

Impact of Durenberger amendment. Of the four provisions contained in the Duncan/Sasser Bills which have received the most attention, the Durenberger Amendment addresses two of these—first, the inadequacy of issuer spread and, second the potential for forced losses on investments. In both instances, the language used is different from that in the Duncan/Sasser Bills. The language differences in the case of investment losses are minor, however, and the comments made by Senator Dole as Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee make it clear that the effect of the Durenberger provision as to investment losses was intended to be the same as that of the Duncan/Sasser Bill.

As to arbitrage, the differences between the two approaches is more significant, although both trend in the same direction. The Durenberger Amendment increases the allowable spread by one-sixteenth of 1 percent overall and for issues under $100,000,000 permits the spread to increase another one-sixteenth of 1 percent on a sliding scale. I don't know how this sliding scale was arrived at or what the theory behind it is supposed to be, although it seems to be based on the theory that smaller issues are more expensive than larger ones. On the basis of my own experience, it does seem true that smaller issues are more expensive to issue, but the magnitude of this penalty, to the extent it may exist at any particular point in time, is much less than the effect of other factors such as market conditions and credit ratings, etc.

As to the sufficiency of the spread, the Agency should be in a position to evaluate this rather well now that it has completed a bond issue under the new law. In that regard it is clear that the requirements of the new law added significantly to administrative expense and that the effect of market conditions would have required the Agency to contribute a significant amount to the issue, even if there had been no desire to reduce the interest rate below that allowed under Section 103A.

Impact of the ruling. In the ruling request submitted by the State of Tennessee on behalf of the Agency, a number of points of clarification were raised concerning items that were covered in the Duncan/Sasser Bills. In the final ruling which was granted on December 24, 1981, a number of these issues were resolved favorably to the Agency. These included: (a) a determination that the Agency could exclude data relating to mobile homes located on leased land in computing purchase price requirements, (b) approval of a method whereby the Agency could make credits to mortgagors against the final payment of the loan which permits the Agency to offset the amount to be credited against declines in the market value of non-mortgage investments without being required to accumulate excess non-mortgage investment income, (c) approval of a simplified method of accounting for rebates and (d) approval of the Agency's method of computing yield on the Bonds assuming recycling of mortgage principal into new loans. In addition, in conjunction with the ruling request, the Agency received approval of its own designation of Targeted Areas.

In many respects the ruling reflected determinations which had been made by the IRS in regulations promulgated by the IRS, FHA and VA subsequent to the introduction of the Duncan/Sasser Bills. As a result of these Regulations, partial relief has been given on the good faith requirements although neither the ruling nor the Regulations put us in a position to give an opinion that the bonds will continue to be tax exempt if they are tax exempt when issued. The Regulations also created certain safe harbors which avoid some of the technical questions involved in the new law. To date the Agency has been protected from the need to go beyond these safe harbors, because the ruling permitted the Agency to exceed these safe harbors in the cases where it was necessary for your recent issues.

The Ruling and Regulations did not, however, address all of the concerns which are addressed by the Duncan/Sasser Bills. Those items which were addressed in the Duncan/Sasser Bills and which remain untouched by either the Durenberger Amendment, the Regulations or the Ruling are:

(1) a provision which allows persons living in substandard housing or who have been displaced by natural disaster or government action to be eligible for the program;

(2) provisions which allow an issuer to measure compliance on a programmatic basis in order to reduce administrative complexity and provide financial flexibility by allowing all bonds issued for the purpose to be treated as one issue;

(3) permission for an issuer to elect to treat statistical areas on a combined basis in its discretion;

(4) inclusion of energy impacted areas as Targeted Areas;

(5) repeal of registration requirements.

Therefore, the Duncan/Sasser Bills in addition to providing more complete relief on the good faith and arbitrage spread questions, than the Durenberger Amendment, the Regulations or the THDA ruling, would address a number of areas which have not been dealt with in any other fashion.

Please let me know if you have any further questions in this regard.

Yours truly,

PAUL A. DEBARY.

FRAUD HOTLINE 3 YEARS OLD

Mr. SASSER. Madam President, I wish to take this opportunity to report to my colleagues on the progress of the General Accounting Office's nationwide, toll-free fraud hotline which celebrated its third anniversary of operation on January 18, 1982.

Simply stated, the first 3 years of the hotline's operation have made the telephone the single most effective weapon against waste, fraud, abuse and inefficiency in the Federal Government.

My colleagues will recall that this hotline was established at my request, and with the strong support at the time of the then ranking minority member of the Legislative Appropriations Subcommittee, former Senator and now Secretary of Health and Human Services, Richard Schweiker.

I first made the suggestion for the hotline at a December 4, 1978, hearing which we conducted on fraud in Government.

Installed at the General Accounting Office with the cooperation of former Comptroller General Elmer Staats, the hotline has the firm support of the new Comptroller General, Charles Bowsher.

In a recent letter to me, Mr. Bowsher indicated that cases substantiated by the hotline "have saved the Federal Government, and thus the taxpayer, millions of dollars," and that, "in addition, there is definitely a deterrent effect" on wasteful, fraudulent abusive and inefficient practices in the Federal Government. The full text of Mr. Bowsher's letter is included at the conclusion of my remarks.

The hotline itself allows any concerned citizen with knowledge of fraud and abuse—in any Federal program—to report that knowledge to a General Accounting Office Special Task Force for the Prevention of Fraud.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the fraud hotline number be printed in the RECORD.

FRAUD HOTLINE

The national toll-free fraud hotline is 800-424-5454. In the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area the number is 644-6987.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that a description of the GAO fraud hotline procedures be printed in the RECORD at this point.

GAO TASK FORCE HOTLINE PROCEDURES

Each caller on the GAO "Fraud Hotline" is interviewed following the general format of a data collection form, with a separate control number assigned to each call. This will be used to track those allegations which appear substantive through later verification of facts and investigations if warranted. The type of information GAO is attempting to record is:

Federal agency or source of Federal funds/material involved in the allegation;

Specific locations where the location is alleged to be taking place;

Recurring or one time;

Length of time activity has been going on;

Extent of activity (some idea of number of people involved); and

Estimate of dollar value involved.

The GAO task force will provide an initial screening of the calls to eliminate those which are obviously nonsubstantive. Those which appear to be substantive but relate to program effectiveness and efficiency rather than fraud will be referred to the operating divisions of GAO for consideration in their audit work. Those which appear to be allegations of fraud will be coordinated with the appropriate agency Inspector General for investigation. In the event the agency Inspector General is unable to respond in a timely manner because of manpower limitations or priority of ongoing work, GAO will perform a verification of facts relative to the allegation utilizing regional field offices. This data will be evaluated by GAO and a decision made relative to referral to the Department of Justice for possible prosecution.

Madam President, it is clear that by allowing anyone to telephone GAO directly from anywhere in the country with an allegation of suspected waste or fraud, and by guaranteeing the caller anonymity if he or she wishes, an effective weapon in the battle for efficient and honest government has been unleashed.

All the data indicate that the hotline has been an enormous success. It has also been a great help in pinpointing problem areas that the Congress can address through legislation.

For instance, the number of calls phoned into the hotline involving allegations concerning Federal employees or Federal employees in conjunction with others—over 31 percent of the total—pointed to the need for stricter controls and auditing procedures for Federal managers.

The proposed Financial Integrity Act (S. 864) is designed to do just this—set in place stricter controls and auditing procedures for Federal managers. The Senate Governmental Affairs Committee approved this legislation last December.

Of course, the ideal situation would be to have no need for a hotline, to have the Federal Government be free of instances of waste, fraud, abuse, and mismanagement. But the fact is that we need the hotline. And if the first 3 years are any measure, we are going to need it for some time to come.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Comptroller General Charles A. Bowsher and a summary report of the GAO's fraud task force hotline activities for the first 35 months of its operation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington D.C., January 8, 1982.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: Threee years ago, during testimony before your subcommittee on the General Accounting Office (GAO) report entitled "Federal Agencies Can, and Should Do More to Combat Fraud In Government Programs" (GGD-78-62, September 19, 1978), you suggested that the GAO should establish a toll-free, nationwide "hotline" to help in the fight against fraud, waste, and abuse in the Federal Government. In January 1979, with your continued support for the idea of a hotline, the GAO implemented this hotline concept. This concept permits any taxpayer to call the GAO directly from anywhere in the United States if he or she has information concerning fraud, waste, or abuse in any Federal department or agency, and has proven to be a significant step in the Federal Government's anti-fraud efforts.

GAO has received over 33,000 calls on this hotline, and over 7,000 of these allegations have been the subject of further investigation and/or audit. In several hundred cases these audits and investigations have resulted in substantiation of the hotline allegations. These substantiated cases have saved the Federal Government, and thus the taxpayer, millions of dollars. In addition, there is definitely a deterrent effect; however, its extent is difficult to measure.

We have enclosed some examples of substantiated cases, as well as a copy of the December 15, 1981, statistical summary.

Once again we thank you for your continued support of the GAO efforts to combat fraud, waste, and abuse in the Federal Government.

Sincerely yours.

CHARLES A. BOWSHER,
Comptroller General of the United States.

FRAUD TASK FORCE HOTLINE SUMMARY,
DECEMBER 15, 1981

VOLUME OF CALLS AND GEOGRAPHIC AREA—FIRST 35 MONTHS OF OPERATION

We announced the hotline telephone number on January 18, 1979, and after the first 35 months of operation, (Dec. 15, 1981), had written up over 10,500 allegations which require classification as to materiality, agency and program involved, and geographic location. In addition to the above, we have received numerous calls that were more appropriately the concern of other Federal agencies or State or local officials that were referred but not written up. We have received over 33,000 calls in total. Computer analysis of the first group of calls written up is complete and the follow-up process on these hotline leads has begun. Additional calls are being received daily, and will be handled by the same process.

Calls have been received from all 50 States, the District of Columbia and overseas locations.

A geographic breakdown based on the 6,548 allegations believed to be substantive in our screening of 10,629 cases is as follows:

MIX OF CALLS—SUBSTANTIVE AGAINST NONSUBSTANTIVE

Approximately 33 percent of all calls received appear to have some substance and are written up for further evaluation. After additional screening approximately 61 percent of those written up appear to have some substance for investigation or audit. For example, of 10,629 allegations that have been screened, 6,548 appear to have some substance for investigation or audit. Of the 6,548, about 25 percent are in the "mismanagement" category, while the remaining 75 percent (4,624 allegations) appear to involve intentional wrongdoing.

TYPES OF ALLEGATIONS RECEIVED

Other than those of a non-substantive nature and those that did not appear to involve the expenditure of Federal funds, hotline allegations fell into one of two categories:

Instances of apparent mismanagement, and Instances of intentional wrongdoing.

In summarizing the allegations of wrongdoing, we found it useful to categorize them according to the participants in the alleged improper activity. We established the following five activity participant categories:

1. Federal employees only.
2. Federal employees in conjunction with others.
3. Federal contractors or grantee organizations.
4. Individual and corporate recipients of Federal financial assistance.
5. Other individuals or corporate entities.

Of the 4,624 allegations of wrongdoing, the highest proportion, 32.1 percent, was in the participant category "Individual and corporate recipients of Federal financial assistance." The table below shows the number and proportion of total wrongdoing allegations falling in each of the five participant categories.

Participating category	Number of allegations	Percent of total
1. Federal employees only	1,186	25.6
2. Federal employees in conjunction with others	281	6.1
3. Federal contractors or grantee organizations	931	20.1
4. Individual and corporate recipients of Federal financial assistance	1,484	32.1
5. Other individuals or corporate entities	742	16.0
Total	4,624	100.0

Looking first at the "Federal employees only" category we found that there were 179 allegations of theft, 223 allegations of private use of Government property, 399 reports of employee working hour abuses, 228 reports of improper financial transactions, and 157 reports of other improper activities.

In the second category, that of "Federal employees in conjunction with others" there were 130 allegations of a bribe or kickback having been paid, 4 allegations of extortion and 147 miscellaneous other allegations.

In the "Federal contractor/grantee" category there were 401 allegations of improper expenditure of Government grant funds, 180 allegations of contract non-performance, 96 reports of the theft of Government funds or property and 254 other allegations of various natures.

The fourth category, "Individual and corporate recipients of Government financial assistance" included 467 allegations of welfare cheating, 256 of cheating on social security benefit eligibility, 320 on collecting inappropriate disability benefits, 76 of cheating on veterans benefits, 107 instances of food stamp cheating, 34 of medicare/medicaid cheating and 224 miscellaneous allegations.

The fifth and final category, "Other individuals or corporate entities" included 602 allegations of personal and corporate income tax cheating, and 140 other allegations of improper activity.

The allegations of wrongdoing that were received to date involve the funds of every one of the 18 cabinet departments of the Federal Government and involve activity in Washington, D.C., and all 50 States.

In 70 percent of the cases, the informant was anonymous. Thirty-one percent of the informants were Federal employees.

THE ASSASSINATION OF TURKISH CONSUL GENERAL KEMAL ARIKAN IN LOS ANGELES

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, twice in the recent past (1980 and 1981) I had the sad occasion to denounce in strongest terms the senseless terrorist killings perpetuated by the two Armenian terrorist groups against diplomats and their families of our trusted NATO allies, the Republic of Turkey.

In those instances the assassinations occurred outside of the United States; not since 1973 had such incidents occurred on American soil. It is tragic that now terrorist killings by the Armenian groups have returned to the United States, despite our calls for increased vigilance against such occurrences by our law enforcement agencies.

While condemning the senseless gunning down of the Turkish Consul Gen. Kemal Arikan of Los Angeles, we must focus on the overall terrorist threat by the various groups of Armenian commandoes, the Marxist ASALA and the Justice Commandoes of Armenian Genocide, who had claimed responsibility for the assassination of the Turkish Consul General.

About the ASALA I stated previously on April 2, 1981:

Mr. President, the pro-Soviet attitude of members of this terrorist organization is a matter of great concern to me. It would appear that the Secret Liberation Army of Armenia may well belong to the list of terrorist organizations reportedly receiving Soviet backing as well as Soviet blessings. At an April 1979 press conference in Beirut, Lebanon, representatives of the Secret Liberation Army of Armenia used a completely Marxist vocabulary, and espoused virulent anti-American slogans.

I hope that the law enforcement agencies in California and the FBI increase their vigilance to extend protection to the Turkish diplomats in the United States, in order to avert further bloodshed of our trusted friends. The Los Angeles Police Department is to be commended for the apprehension of one of the gunmen and we hope that the second assailant will also be in police custody. I trust the full severity of the law will be applied against these dastardly assassins.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the eulogy given by His Excellency Sukru Elekdag, Ambassador of the Turkish Republic, at the funeral of Consul General Kemal Arikan, on February 3, 1982, be inserted into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the eulogy was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Kemal Arikan, the Los Angeles Consul General of the Turkish Republic, on the 28th day of January, while discharging his duties, fell victim to a distardly crime in this city.

In addition to bringing profound sorrow to Mr. Arikan's family, his friends and his colleagues, his loss has brought grief to the Turkish Nation, whose valued son has fallen in its service.

Kemal Arikan, the Consul General of an allied and friendly country to the United States, his family, and the entire consular staff, had been carrying out their duties here in Los Angeles under constant threat and harassment. Kemal Arikan's residence was bombed, his office was bombed, and his life threatened repeatedly.

Kemal Arikan is the third Turkish Diplomat to have been murdered in Los Angeles. In 1983, Turkish Consul General Baydar and Deputy Consul General Demir were shot down by an Armenian. During the ensuing period, 17 Turkish diplomats or members of their immediate families were murdered in different parts of the world by Armenian terrorist organizations. In other words, the chain of killing and shedding of innocent life that was initated here in Los Angeles has, after claiming so many victims, come full circle.

Persons claiming to represent the Justice Commandos of the Armenian Genocide have taken responsibility for the assassination of Kemal Arikan. The same organization has also claimed responsibility for the murders of the Turkish Ambassador to the Vatican, Taha Carim, the wife of the Turkish Ambassador to Spain, Necla Kuneralp, retired Ambassador Beşir Balcioğlu, the Turkish Consul General in Sidney, Australia, Şarik Ariyak, and his aide Engin Sever.

The Armenian Justice Commandos have also declared that, together with ASALA, an Armenian Communist terrorist group, they have assassinated Ahmet Benler, son of the Turkish Ambassador to the Netherlands, and Yilmaz Colpan, Press Counselor in Paris.

Last week's murder of Kemal Arikan is clear evidence that Armenian terrorists have expanded their network in the United States to intensify their wanton, criminal acts here. It would be a big mistake to dissociate Kemal Arikan's murder either from all those which preceded it or from the acts of terrorism to which General Dozier and Charles Ray, the American military attaché in Paris, were subjected. These and other recent terrorist acts are related and part of a larger phenomenon, an integral plan to weaken and subvert the societies of the Free World.

ASALA, the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia, for example, is an avowedly Communist organization whose declared mission is to detach a strategically important part of Turkey and annex it to Soviet Armenia. It is in open secret that ASALA receives support from other, non-Armenian, terrorist organizations in Europe and the Middle East and from Marxist-Leninist entities. These groups share a common objective—the destruction of those societies in which Western ideals and liberties can flourish.

It should not be forgotten that these terrorist organizations, in many instances, attempt to appear to champion the illusory goals of various groups whenever they can use such goals and groups for their own dark purposes. The pretext for the murder of Kemal Arikan, as with the murders of his predecessors here in 1973, reportedly is to avenge a grievance which stems from misrepresented events of almost 70 years ago. The continued propagation of this distortion of history breeds vengefulness from generation to generation and plays into the hands of Armenian terrorists.

In Turkey, there are tens of thousands of people whose parents and other close relatives perished because of Armenian actions during the tragic incidents of 1915 in the midst of World War I. But, these Turks have chosen to forgo bitterness and to adopt a spirit of peaceful reconciliation. It is senseless to open the wounds of 70 years ago when the world has been striving to heal the wounds of the far more recent Second World War.

One would hope that the Armenians of goodwill will condemn terrorists who shed innocent blood in 1982 and repudiate their actions. Likewise, we should all be alert to brand as counterfeit those condemnations of terrorism that in the same breath rationalize it. These are especially disturbing when they are uttered by public officials.

The reopening of ancient wounds is also senseless because the Turkish Republic, whose foundation was constructed over the ruins of the Ottoman Empire after World War I, today is a strong, robust state of 46,000,000, a valued member of the Western world, and a staunch ally of the United States. Turkey has the power, the capacity, and the will to preserve the integrity of its homeland and to protect it from the designs of its enemies.

Americans, no less than Turks, cannot tolerate terrorism. The security of the public domain is a primary requirement for a free society, whether in the cities of Europe or in cities such as Los Angeles.

Terrorism is a dreadful plague of our era and a scourge to be eradicated. If the Western world is unable to deal with it, our societies will be disabled. It behooves all civilized countries to work for an effective cooperation in the fight against international terrorism.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

BUDGET MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 109

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying documents; which, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, was referred jointly to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Budget:

To the Congress of the United States:

One year ago, in my first address to the country, I went before the American people to report on the condition of our economy. It was not a happy occasion.

Inflation, interest, and unemployment rates were at painfully high levels, while real growth, job creation, new investment, personal savings, and productivity gains had virtually ceased. Our economy was staggering under the burden of excessive tax rates, double-digit inflation, runaway Government spending, counter-productive regulations, and uneven money supply growth. The economy, I declared, was in the "worst mess" in half a century.

To our great good fortune, there were many in the Congress who understood the nature of our difficulties and who rose with us to meet the challenge. Fundamental and long-overdue remedies were proposed and put in place. Together, we enacted the biggest spending and tax reductions in history. Counter-productive regulations have been swept away, and the Federal Reserve has taken action to bring excessive monetary growth under control.

The first year of the 97th Congress will be remembered for its decisive action to hold down spending and cut tax rates. Today, the question before us is whether the second year of this Congress will bring forward equal determination, courage, and wisdom. Clearly, there is a great deal more to be done.

Some seek instant relief from the economic problems we face. There is no such panacea. Our program began October 1, and it cannot solve in 4 months problems that have been building for more than 4 decades. All the quick fixes tried in the past not only failed to solve but actually aggravated our economic difficulties. They simply ensured a new cycle of boom and bust, of exaggerated hopes and eventual disappointment.

We did not promise the American people a miracle. We did promise them progress, and progress they will get.

Our goal was and remains economic recovery—the return of noninflationary and sustained prosperity. We seek a larger economic pie to provide all Americans more jobs, more after-tax income, and a better life. Quick fixes won't get us there.

What will get us there is firm resolve and unwavering adherence to the four fundamentals of our economic recovery program that I outlined to the Congress 1 year ago:

—Reducing personal and business taxes to stimulate saving, investment, work effort, and productivity.

—Reducing the growth of overall Federal spending by eliminating Federal activities that overstep the proper sphere of Federal Government responsibilities.

—Reducing the Federal regulatory burden in areas where the Federal Government intrudes unnecessarily into our private lives or interferes unnecessarily with the efficient conduct of private business or of State or local government.

—Supporting a moderate and steady monetary policy, to bring inflation under control.

At the same time, I have proposed strengthening the Nation's defenses, to restore our margin of safety and counter the Soviet military buildup

Congressional response to these proposals has been positive and gratifying. While much remains to be done, we have made a good beginning.

The Nation's fiscal policy is now firmly embarked on a new, sound, and sustainable course. For the first time in 2 decades, the destructive pattern of runaway spending, rising tax rates, and expanding budgetary commitments has been slowed, and with the cooperation of the Congress this year, will finally be broken.

—Where the growth rate of spending had soared to 17.4% in 1980, it is now declining dramatically—to 10.4% this year, and under the budget I am submitting, to 4.5% next year.

—Where budget growth totaled $166 billion from 1979 to 1981, spending will rise by only 60% of that amount from 1981 to 1983, despite cost-of-living adjustments and the needed defense buildup.

—After having reached 23% of GNP in 1981, the Federal Government's claim on our economy will steadily recede—to 22% in 1983 and to below 20% by 1987.

—After a decade of tax-flation in which fiscal and monetary excess fueled the unrelenting rise of prices and the automatic increase of taxes, significant tax rate reductions have been enacted. A permanent safeguard against bracket creep and Government profiteering on inflation—income tax indexing—has also been created.

—Where Government had passively tolerated the swift, continuous growth of automatic entitlements and had actively short-changed the national security, a long-overdue reordering of priorities has begun, entitlement growth is being checked, and the restoration of our defenses is underway.

This dramatic progress in reordering fiscal policy has been paralleled by a similar redirection of monetary policy. The excessive, unsustainable, and eventually ruinous growth of money and credit of the past decade has been curbed. The inflation spiral has been broken. The growth of prices is slowing down. Peoples' savings are beginning to flow out of unproductive speculation, tangible assets, and other inflation hedges back into the Nation's financial arteries where they will be available to power economic recovery, more jobs, and growing incomes and opportunities.

THE BUDGET TOTALS

	1981 actual	1982 estimate	1983 estimate	1984 estimate	1985 estimate
Budget receipts	599.3	626.8	666.1	723.0	796.6
Budget outlays	657.2	725.3	757.6	805.9	868.5
Surplus or deficit(—)	—57.9	—98.6	—91.5	—82.9	—71.9
Budget authority	718.4	765.5	801.9	858.0	943.5

In short, we are putting the false prosperity of overspending, easy credit, depreciating money, and financial excess behind us. A solid foundation has been laid for a sound dollar, sustained real economic growth, lasting financial stability, and noninflationary prosperity for all Americans.

We are also moving to shackle the regulatory juggernaut that burdened production, consumed jobs, and diminished productivity growth. During the past year no significant new regulatory statutes were enacted and few major new regulations were imposed. Additions to the Federal Register declined by 23,000 pages. Benefit-cost analysis was made mandatory for regulations. Dozens of existing regulations were reviewed, modified, or eliminated. Without taking into account billions of dollars of savings from regulations never formally proposed because of the changed climate our program has created, quantifiable one-time cost savings of over $3 billion and recurring annual savings of nearly $2 billion have been realized. And the effort has just begun.

A YEAR OF HISTORIC ACHIEVEMENT

These remarkable achievements are the cornerstones of our national economic recovery program. They far exceed anything that the skeptics and critics ever dreamed possible just 1 year ago. They occurred because the executive and legislative branches of our Government joined together to respond to the mandate of the American people and overcome the impediments that had paralyzed Washington for a decade. Together, we have launched a process of reform and change that can transform the course of events.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 is the largest, most comprehensive, and most constructive tax bill ever adopted. With the cooperation of the Congress and support of the public, it was enacted in just 5 months. It addressed and substantially remedied most of the tax system's shortcomings and disincentives that had accumulated over decades—distortions that were imposing an increasingly heavy toll on investment, economic growth, and job creation.

—The penalty tax rate on investment income has been eliminated. By dropping the top rate from 70 to 50%, the attractiveness of tax shelters will be reduced and the incentives for productive investment in stocks, bonds, new business ventures, and other financial assets will be increased. Our Nation's capital will again flow to the growth of business and jobs rather than to the vendors of protection from punitive taxation.

—Marginal tax rates have been significantly lowered for the first time in two decades. The 23% across-the-board rate reduction will mean $183 billion in lower taxes for individuals over the first 3 years. The financial reward for savings, work effort, and new production will stop diminishing and start rising once again.

—Powerful new incentives for savings have been established. Beginning this year, 50 million workers will be eligible for the first time to set aside tax-free up to $2,000 per year for Individual Retirement Accounts. The annual limit for existing Keogh and IRA investors will also be raised. By sharply altering the incentives for saving as opposed to consumption, a huge new flow of current income will be channeled toward restoring our productivity and lifting our national savings rate from last place in the industrial world.

—The taxation of phantom corporate profits has also been significantly curtailed. The new accelerated cost recovery system will shorten depreciation periods to 5 years for machinery and 15 years for structures. This will permit fuller recovery of asset costs, a more valid accounting of taxable profits, and a reasonable after-tax return on investments for the first time in years. By eliminating the drastic under-depreciation provided in previous tax law, after-tax business cash flow will be increased by $10½ billion this year and $211 billion over the next 6 years. This growing stream of funds for modernization, new machinery, new technology, new products, and new plants will revive our lagging productivity, restore our competitiveness in world markets, and spur the steady growth of jobs, production, and real incomes.

—The confiscatory taxing of estates and inheritances has been halted as well. By raising the exemption to $600,000, by lowering the rate to 50 percent, and by removing the limits on the marital deduction, 99.7 percent of all estates will eventually be exempt from estate taxation. Hard-working American farmers, small businessmen, investors, and workers can once again be confident that the sweat, sacrifices, and accumulations of a lifetime will belong to their heirs rather than their Government.

—Government profiteering on inflation has been abolished. Beginning in 1985, the individual income tax brackets, the zero-bracket amount, and the personal exemption will be corrected annually for inflation. Bracket creep will never again systematically plunder the rewards for production and effort. Government will never again use inflation to take a rising share of the peoples' income without a vote of their representatives.

The past year's achievements on spending control and the reestablishment of budgetary discipline are no less impressive than the sweeping tax changes. For the first time ever, the Congress activated its central budgetary machinery and overcame the spending impulses of its fragmented parts. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 was a watershed in fiscal history—a giant step toward the restoration of fiscal discipline. By the accounting of its own Congressional Budget Office, spending will be $35 billion lower this year and about $130 billion lower over the next 3 years due to just one bill passed in only 5 months after having been considered by 30 different committees, a bill that reduced, reformed or eliminated hundreds of programs. The growth of budgetary outlays is at last being brought in line with the growth of the tax base and the national income. Excess spending commitments, unnecessary programs and overlapping activities were meaningfully addressed in the Reconciliation Act for the first time in decades.

—As a result of congressional action in 1981, the growth of entitlements will be reduced by $41 billion during the next 3 years. For the first time, eligibility standards for food stamps and student loans have been tightened. Unemployment benefits have been targeted to States where they are needed. Subsidies for non-needy students have been reduced in the school lunch program. Abuses of the medicaid, nutrition, and AFDC programs have been curtailed, saving $14.4 billion over the next 3 years. Overly generous and unaffordable twice-a-year cost-of-living adjustments for Federal retirees have been eliminated. The "uncontrollables" are being brought under control, and benefits have been retargeted where they are most needed.

—Dozens of ineffective or counterproductive programs have been eliminated or reduced. The $4 billion make-work CETA public sector jobs program was abolished. Extravagant dairy subsidies have been cut substantially. The ineffective $700 million Economic Development Administration is being phased out. The Community Services Administration has been eliminated. An unnecessary $2 billion in Government subsidies for new energy supplies and technologies has been cut. The excessively-funded impact aid program was substantially scaled back. In short, a long-overdue housecleaning of excess budgetary commitments was accomplished.

—Inappropriate Federal subsidies have been withdrawn. Legislation to return Conrail to the private sector has been enacted. The National Consumer Cooperative Bank has been privatized. Subsidies to the auto industry for new technology demonstrations have been eliminated. Operating subsidies to local mass transit systems are being phased out. Subsidies to exporters have been sharply curtailed. Subsidized disaster loans to financially viable businesses have been eliminated.

—A major stride toward rationalizing the structure, reducing the cost, and increasing State and local flexibility in the Nation's $91 billion grant-in-aid system has been enacted. Fifty-seven narrow, red-tape-ridden categorical grants programs have been replaced with 9 block grants. The pages of regulation imposed on State and local governments have been reduced from over 300 to 6, while the cost to the Federal budget has been reduced.

—Total funding for nondefense discretionary programs has been reduced. After continuous growth for two decades, the budget cost of these programs will actually decline from $137 billion in 1981 to $130 billion in 1982.

—An impressive start at reducing fraud, waste, abuse, and unnecessary Government overhead was made. The President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, established to coordinate a Government-wide attack on fraud and waste, saved $2 billion in the last 6 months of 1981 alone. A comprehensive effort to collect $33 billion in delinquent debts has been launched and will recover $1.5 billion in 1982 and $4.0 billion in 1983. These estimates include recoveries of delinquent taxes due to the Internal Revenue Service. Federal nondefense employment has been reduced by 35,000 since January 1981. The cost of Government travel, publications, and consultants has been reduced substantially.

At the same time that the Congress joined in these long-overdue efforts to pare back the size of the Federal budget and slow its momentum of growth, it has fully supported our ambitious but essential plan to rebuild our national defense. A year ago every component of military strength was flashing warning lights of neglect, under-investment, and deteriorating capability. Today, health is being restored.

—Pervasive deficiencies in readiness—including too many units not ready for combat, too many weapons systems out of commission, too few people with critical combat skills, and too few planes and ships fully capable of their missions—are being corrected. Funds for operations and maintenance, including training and aircraft flying hours, have been boosted. Backlogs of combat equipment needing repair are being eliminated. Adequate supplies of spare parts necessary to support high operating rates for training, as well as to provide war reserves, are being purchased.

—The serious inadequacy in pay and benefits that threatened the all-volunteer force, caused an exodus of skilled personnel, and sapped morale throughout the armed services has been corrected. Last year's 14.3% pay increase has improved recruit quality, boosted reenlistment rates, stopped the drain of critical skills, and contributed to the dramatic revival of morale in our military services. End-strength goals are now being exceeded. In addition, the percentage of recruits with higher test scores has risen in the past year.

—Critical investments in conventional and strategic force modernization are now moving rapidly forward. A new bomber for early deployment and an advanced (Stealth) bomber for the 1990's have been approved to retain our capability to penetrate Soviet air defenses. Development of a new, larger, and more accurate MX missile to preserve our land-based deterrent is proceeding. A 5-year shipbuilding program including 133 new ships and a total investment of $96 billion—double the 5-year program of the previous administration—has been launched. Rapid production of new combat systems including the M-1 Abrams tank, the AV-8B Marine Corps attack aircraft and the F/A-18 Navy tactical fighter have been approved. Improvements in our airlift and sealift forces to transport equipment and soldiers rapidly to counter military aggression anywhere in the world, are moving forward.

NO TIME TO RETREAT

These achievements of the first year truly constitute a new beginning. In every major dimension of national strength and well-being we have launched the redirection of policy that was so desperately needed and so long overdue. We are ending the destructive inflation and the financial disorder built up over a decade. We have removed the yoke of over-taxation from our workers and our business enterprises. We have begun to dismantle the regulatory straitjacket that impeded our commerce and sapped our prosperity. And we have reversed the dangerous erosion of our military capabilities.

The task before us now is a different one, but no less crucial. Our task is to persevere; to stay the course; to shun retreat; to weather the temporary dislocations and pressures that must inevitably accompany the restoration of national economic, fiscal, and military health.

The correction of previous fiscal and monetary excesses has come too late to avert an unwelcome, painful, albeit temporary business slump. In the months ahead there will be temptation to resort to pump-priming and spending stimulus programs. Such efforts have failed in the past, are not needed now, and must be resisted at every turn. Our program for permanent economic recovery is already in place. Artificial stimulants will undermine that program, not reinforce it.

Likewise, previous excesses in money and credit growth have resulted in financial strain in many regions and sectors of our national economy. The adjustment to lower inflation and a more moderate money and credit policy did not come soon enough to avoid interest rates and unemployment far higher than we would like, and that we are working to reduce. But these effects are temporary. They cannot be remedied by a return to rapid, unsustainable expansion of Federal spending and money growth, which would drive inflation and interest rates to new highs. Our hard-won gains in reducing inflation must be preserved and extended—because permanent reduction of interest rates and unemployment is impossible if the fight against inflation is abandoned, just when it is being won.

Similarly, our budget deficits will be large because of the current recession, and because it is impossible in a short period of time to correct the mistakes of decades. But our incentive-minded tax policy and our security-based defense programs are right and necessary for long-run peace and prosperity, and must not be tampered with in a vain attempt to cure deficits in the short-run. The answer to deficits is economic growth and indefatigable efforts to control spending and borrowing. These principles we dare not abandon.

THE DEFICIT PROBLEM: ITS ORIGINS

Despite the new course we have charted and the gains we have achieved, the voices of doubt, retreat, and rejection are beginning to rise. They conveniently forget that the present business slump was not caused by our program but is the result of the accumulated burdens of past policy errors, which we have taken action to redress. They fail to comprehend that our spending cuts and tax reductions were not designed to redistribute the output of a stagnant economy, but to revive the economy's growth and to increase its size—for the jobless as well as the affluent, for those who aspire to get ahead as well as those who have already arrived.

Increasingly, the larger budget deficits that we unavoidably face are offered as evidence that our entire course should be recharted. The matter of budget deficits, therefore, must be addressed squarely. We must fully comprehend why they have grown from our original projections, why they may remain with us for some time to come, what dangers they pose if not vigorously combated and what steps we can and must take to steadily reduce their size and drain on our available savings.

Our original plan called for a balanced budget in 1984. Balance is no longer achievable in 1984, but the factors that have postponed its realization are neither permanent nor cause for abandoning the goal of eventually living within our means.

In the near term, the most important setback to our budgetary timetable is the recession now underway. During 1982, receipts will decline by $31 billion and outlays rise by $8 billion due to the falloff of business activity and the increase of unemployment-related payments. This factor alone accounts for nearly all of the difference between the $45 billion 1982 deficit we projected last year and our current estimate of $98.6 billion.

While the recession will end before this fiscal year is over, its budgetary impact will spill over for many years into the future. It will take time for the unemployment rate to come down and safety net payments to diminish. The growth of receipts will recover, but not at the levels previously projected. This will add billions to deficits for 1983 and 1984.

The second major factor widening the deficit projection is interest payments on our trillion dollar debt. Here we are being penalized doubly for the misguided policies of the past.

The discredited philosophy of spend and spend, borrow and borrow, saddled us with a permanent debt burden of staggering dimensions. This year's interest payment of $83 billion exceeds the size of the entire Federal budget as recently as 1958.

In addition, past fiscal, monetary, and credit excesses have resulted in temporarily high interest rates—rates that will come down, but only as inflation abates, private and public financing practices adjust, and long-term confidence rebuilds. Since market confidence has been so badly shaken by runaway inflation and interest rates in the past 3 years, it is apparent that interest rates over the next several years will fall less rapidly than we had originally anticipated. Between the huge inherited base of national debt, the higher interest rates, and the large prospective additions to the national debt in the next several years, our total debt service costs will rise substantially.

Interest payments on the debt will exceed our original projections by $18 billion in 1982, $32 billion in 1983, and $182 billion over 1982–86 taken as a whole. The interest rate/debt service factor, then, constitutes a major source of the setback to our budget timetable. But let us be clear about its origins: it arises primarily from a legacy of past excesses, not from a shortfall in our current budget control efforts, nor from a flaw in our overall program.

The third and most important factor contributing to the growth in deficit projections is quite simply the ironic by-product of our rapid and decisive success in bringing down the rate of inflation. Our economic forecast last February projected a 9.5-percent inflation rate in calendar year 1981 and a further decline to 7.7 percent in 1982. This projection was scorned by many as too rosy just 1 year ago. Yet the actual inflation rate in 1981 turned out to be lower than our projection, and the inflation decline this year and next year almost certainly will exceed our earlier projections.

This is welcome news to every American and we have adjusted our inflation forecast accordingly. But lower rates of price increase also mean lower inflation components in wages and incomes and a reduced flow of inflation-swollen tax receipts to the Treasury.

This point is not merely academic. Over the next 5 years, our forecast projects a 9.9 percent average rate of growth in nominal GNP reflecting a steady fall of inflation to about 4½ percent by 1987. If nominal GNP growth were just 2 percent higher each year, reflecting a continuation of higher inflation, Federal receipts would be enlarged by the staggering sum of $353 billion over the 5 years. On paper, at least, the budget would be nearly balanced in 1987 rather than more than $50 billion in deficit.

But if the last decade offers any lesson, it is that we cannot inflate our way to budget balance. Indeed, every budget from 1975 forward projected a balanced budget 2 years into the future and growing surpluses in the out-years. Not one of these surpluses materialized for a very compelling reason: the monetary excesses needed to finance inflationary growth of wages and incomes are the enemy of savings, investment, real economic growth, and fundamental business confidence and financial stability. They lead to the kind of pervasive economic breakdown that we experienced during 1979–81—a breakdown that swells Government spending, interrupts the flow of receipts, and causes prospective budgetary surpluses to vanish in a flow of red ink.

Thus, we cannot and will not pursue the will-o'-the-wisp of reflation nor the phantom of future budget surpluses premised on a continuance of high inflation.

Instead, we must recognize that for a period of time, success in our unyielding battle against inflation will appear to work against our goal of a balanced budget. Thus, while our current revenues will reflect the decline of inflation today, part of our current outlays will reflect the higher rates of inflation in years past. This is especially true in the case of some $249 billion in indexed programs. Generally, the inflation rate used to adjust indexed benefits lags a year or more behind the current payment period. During 1983, for example, an inflation rate of 6.5 percent is projected, but cost-of-living adjustments to social security and other program benefits will be 8.1 percent based largely on the actual inflation experience of 1981. Much the same is true of the $96.4 billion in debt service for 1983. Some part of that will reflect the higher cost of debt securities issued in 1980–82 when inflation and interest rates will have been higher than is now projected for 1983.

Thus, the conquest of inflation will contribute to budgetary imbalance for some years to come. But these deficits will prove manageable if we understand why we have them and redouble our efforts to reduce them.

The final factor contributing to the worsening of the deficit outlook is that all of the budget savings we had planned for last year were not actually achieved. Most importantly, our plan to ensure the short- and long-run solvency of social security was discarded by the Congress. In an effort to eliminate partisanship and facilitate movement toward a constructive solution, our reform proposal has been withdrawn in favor of a bipartisan commission charged with developing a plan to rescue the social security system by next fall. I am confident that the commission will do just that, but in the meanwhile our outlay projections must be increased by $6 billion in 1983 and $18 billion for 1987.

Likewise, the Congress failed to adopt all of the reforms we proposed for medicaid, guaranteed student loans, food stamps and other entitlements. Without further action, about $4 billion would be added to the 1983 deficit in these areas alone. While major and unprecedented action was taken to curb the growth of entitlements last year, the shortfall is still substantial. Entitlement reforms not acted upon by the Congress last year will add nearly $20 billion to the deficit over the next 3 years. When this is combined with substantial added outlays for farm subsidies and for discretionary programs that were not reformed, it is clear that the task of budget control is far from complete.

THE BUDGET DEFICIT IN PERSPECTIVE

Taken together, the effects of recession, higher interest rates, declining inflation, and incomplete congressional action will mean high, continuing, and troublesome Federal budget deficits. Constant vigilance and relentless efforts to pare back future spending and borrowing will be imperative to ensure that they are not permitted to worsen and add further pressure to financial markets and interest rates.

Nevertheless, three features of these high deficit numbers must not be lost sight of even as we seek eventually to eliminate them.

First, even the 1982 deficit of $98.6 billion is not unprecedented in the context of a recession and recovery cycle. Relative to the present size of the U.S. economy, the budget deficit would have been $94 billion for 1975, followed by deficits of $139 billion, $91 billion and $97 billion in the next 3 years, respectively.

Second, these deficits reflect the excess spending commitments of past rather than new spending programs with potential to grow in the future. That means that by remaining firm in our efforts to reduce waste and excess, reform entitlements, reduce low priority spending, and gradually return domestic programs back to State and local governments, the gap between spending subject to firm fiscal discipline and revenues being lifted by steady economic expansion will gradually diminish.

Finally, the share of GNP taken in taxes will be substantially lower and the incentives for savings markedly stronger. This expansion of the total savings supply will increase our capacity to absorb deficits and give us additional time to work toward their elimination.

$239 BILLION DEFICIT REDUCTION PLAN

The prospect of high deficits during the transition to strong economic growth and low inflation contains a profound warning: any relaxation of our budget control efforts, any backsliding to spending politics as usual, any retreat to time-worn excuses about "uncontrollables"—that results in spending growth significantly above our projections, will mean a serious threat to the progress of our entire economic recovery program. There is precious little margin for shirking or diluting the task the American people have charged us with. That task is nothing less than a constant, comprehensive, ceaseless search for ways to reduce the size of Government and the future growth of its spending.

The 1983 budget I am presenting to the Congress faithfully adheres to that mandate. If all proposed measures are adopted, the prospective deficit will be reduced by $56 billion next year, $84 billion in 1984, and $99 billion in 1985. In short, the budget this year represents much more than simply a tabulation of accounts or a compilation of spending decisions, large and small. Instead, it represents a far-reaching, resourceful, and integrated blueprint for reducing the prospective deficit by $239 billion over the next 3 years. It is a bold action plan that, if faithfully implemented, can cut the prospective deficits over that period by nearly 50 percent.

Our plan for deficit reduction consists of five parts. It addresses each area of the budget where actions to reduce the gap between spending and revenues are possible and desirable.

The first area concerns nonsocial security entitlements. Despite the heartening progress we made toward reform last year, the cost of these automatic spending programs will rise to $201 billion in 1983 without further action. This figure compares to only $119 billion in 1979.

Thus, our 1983 budget proposals continue the objective set out previously: to reduce the swift growth of automatic entitlements while preserving benefits for the truly needy. If acted upon fully by the Congress, these new reform measures will save $12 billion next year and $52 billion over the next 3 years. They include new steps to tighten eligibility, reduce errors and abuse and curtail unwarranted benefits in the welfare, medical, and nutrition programs. The explosive growth of medical programs—16.7% per year since 1978—will be contained with tighter reimbursement standards for providers, modest copayment requirements for medicaid beneficiaries, and, later in the year, a comprehensive plan to reform the health care reimbursement system and provide new cost control incentives for all participants. We have also proposed measures to target guaranteed student loans better to those with financial need and to limit the cost growth of Federal military and civilian retirement programs.

Nevertheless, let me be clear on this point. Our administration has not and will not turn its back on our elderly or needy citizens. Under our new budget, funding for social insurance programs will be more than double the amount spent only 6 years ago. For example, the Federal Government will subsidize 95 million meals every day. That is one of every seven of all meals served in America. Headstart, senior nutrition programs, and child welfare programs will not be cut from the levels we proposed last year.

The second component of our deficit reduction plan covers domestic discretionary and other programs for purposes ranging from agricultural research to housing subsidies and manpower training. Our proposed savings here total $14 billion next year and $76 billion over the next 3 years.

These savings measures involve two essential principles. First, where programs are unnecessary, can be better targeted or can be significantly streamlined, we have proposed substantial reductions. Our proposals to convert the fragmented and wasteful CETA training program to a block grant, to target low-income energy assistance to the colder States where it is needed, to combine the WIC program with the child and maternal health block grant, and to further reduce subsidies to business for energy technology development and commercialization are all examples of this principle.

The other principle governing discretionary programs is that we have generally not provided inflation allowances for them. This will provide a powerful incentive to reduce overhead, waste, and low-priority activities and ensure that the money we spend for many worthwhile purposes in the areas of education, transportation, community development, and research is utilized in the most efficient and productive manner possible. Our deficit problem is simply too severe to permit business as usual to continue any longer.

The third component of the deficit reduction program involves user fees, or more appropriately, the recovery of costs borne by the taxpayers generally, but that predominantly benefit a limited group of businesses, communities or individuals. Total savings would amount to $2.5 billion in 1983 and $10 billion over the next 3 years.

While the Congress made great strides on most of our proposed budget cuts last year, the user fees proposals were a noticeable and disappointing departure from this pattern. The case for action now is even stronger than it was last year. With sacrifices required of almost every beneficiary of Federal programs, it is simply inexcusable and intolerable that yacht owners escape without paying even a small part of the Coast Guard services; or that commercial and general aviation are not paying the cost of the air traffic control system that ensures their safety; or that ship and barge operators do not pay a fair share of the costs of waterways maintained by the Federal Government. Our user fee package corrects these and similar shortcomings in current budget policy and will contribute significantly toward reducing the deficit.

The fourth part of the plan is aimed at the executive branch and the most inexcusable of all forms of spending: lax management, the toleration of fraud and abuse, the failure to recover debts owed the Government or to dispose of properties it does not need, and outdated, inefficient, procurement practices.

Our fiscal plan has always assumed that our new management would take hold, and that savings would be possible in areas we have simply never looked at before. After 1 year, our new management team has indeed taken hold, the results to date have been impressive, and our plans for future savings are bold and far-reaching. All told, these efforts will reduce the budget deficit by $20 billion next year and $68 billion over the next 3 years.

We will collect the debts we are owed and the taxes we are due. New legislation will be needed in some cases, but much of these savings will flow from tighter, more aggressive management throughout executive branch agencies.

Likewise, we will move systematically to reduce the vast Federal holdings of surplus land and real property. It is estimated that the Federal Government owns approximately 775 million acres, and 405,000 buildings, covering about 2.6 billion square feet. Some of this real property is not in use and would be of greater value to society if transferred to the private sector. During the next 3 years we will save $9 billion by shedding these unnecessary properties while fully protecting and preserving our national parks, forests, wildernesses and scenic areas.

Our management efforts will also be directed toward the more cost-effective procurement of the goods and services required by the Federal Government. The changes we seek will increase competition for the Government's business, reduce and simplify paperwork and regulations, and develop better standards for our procurement processes and personnel. Over time these efforts will yield large outyear savings not included in the budget totals.

Finally, our emphasis thus far has been on reducing excessive tax rates and shrinking the Government's take from the paychecks of workers and the profits of business. On that principle we will not waver. But that does not mean unintended loopholes should go uncorrected, that obsolete tax incentives should be continued, or that profitable business should not contribute at least some minimum fair share to the cost of financing Government. Thus, our deficit reduction plan includes $34 billion over the next 3 years in additional receipts from new initiatives in these areas.

About one-third of this total is attributable to our proposal to strengthen the minimum corporate tax, and a substantial share of the other tax revisions will also affect business. In every case, these measures involve the collection of a tax that is owed now or that was intended by the Congress, or elimination of incentives that are no longer needed due to the sweeping reform of business taxation contained in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

These new proposals will have no adverse impact on our economic recovery program, are fair and equitable, and will contribute significantly to the reduction of future deficits.

CONTINUING THE RESTORATION OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Our 1983 budget plan continues the effort begun last year to strengthen our military posture in four primary areas: strategic forces, combat readiness, force mobility, and general purpose forces.

A thorough 8-month review of U.S. strategic forces and objectives preceded my decision this past October to strengthen our strategic forces. The review found that the relative imbalance with the Soviet Union will be at its worst in the mid-1980's and hence needs to be addressed quickly. It also concluded that the multiple protective structure basing proposal for MX did not provide long-term survivability since the Soviets could counter it (at about the same cost) by simply deploying more warheads.

In addition, our review pointed to serious deficiencies in force survivability, endurance, and the capability to exercise command and control during nuclear war. Current communications and warning systems were found to be vulnerable to severe disruption from an attack of very modest scale.

The 1983 budget funds programs to correct these deficiencies. The 1983 strategic program of $23.1 billion, an increase of $6.9 billion over 1982, provides for both near-term improvements and longer-term programs. These initiatives include:

—Early deployment of cruise missiles on existing bombers and attack submarines.

—Acquisition of a new bomber (the B-1B) and development of advanced technology (Stealth) bomber for deployment in the 1990's to provide a continued capability to penetrate Soviet defenses.

—Development and procurement of a new, larger, and more accurate land-based missile, the MX.

—Continued deployment of Trident ballistic missile submarines to strengthen the sea-based leg of our strategic deterrent.

Longer term programs include: development of a survivable deployment plan for the MX missile, development of a new submarine-launched ballistic missile, continued improvements in the survivability of warning and communications systems, and improvements in strategic defenses against both bomber and missile attacks.

The 1983 budget provides $114.3 billion in operations and military personnel costs, an increase of over $13 billion from the 1982 level to improve the combat readiness of our forces.

Today a major conflict involving the United States could occur without adequate time to upgrade U.S. force readiness. Our concerns with military readiness reflect both the long lead time required to procure sophisticated equipment (both parts and finished equipment) and past failures to provide adequate peacetime support for combat units. We cannot wait for a period of rising tensions before bringing forces up to combat readiness.

My program will continue to bolster combat readiness by increasing training, operating rates, and equipment support. There will be increased aircraft flying hours and supply inventories. In addition, backlogs of combat equipment and real property awaiting maintenance will be reduced. Also, the 1983 budget will provide levels of military compensation that will improve the readiness and capability of the All Volunteer Force.

Current U.S. mobility forces cannot move the required combat or combat support units fast enough to counter effectively military aggression in Europe, Korea, or in the Southwest Asia/Persian Gulf region. For example, at present only a small light combat force could be moved rapidly to the Southwest Asia region. Major mobility shortages include wide-body military cargo aircraft; fast logistics ships; and prepositioned ships and associated support equipment. Elimination of these shortages is an essential first step toward improving U.S. military capability during the first 30 days after the beginning of a crisis.

The 1983 budget provides $4.4 billion for:

—Initial procurement of a fleet of improved C-5 cargo aircraft, and additional KC-10A tanker/cargo aircraft that will double our wide-bodied military airlift capability by the 1990's.

—Continued upgrading of existing C-5A aircraft to extend their effectiveness beyond the year 2000.

—Conversion of four additional fast logistic ships that will provide the capability to move heavy combat forces rapidly.

—Chartering a fleet of supply ships that can be stationed with equipment and supplies in Southwest Asia to reduce the time required for deployment of heavy forces.

In the last decade, the Soviet Union introduced large quantities of highly capable, new-generation tactical equipment including combat ships, tanks, and aircraft, which must be countered by modernized U.S. forces. Also, the traditional U.S. superiority in system quality has been considerably narrowed, making Soviet quantitative advantages more serious. The Soviet military force buildup has increased the risk that they may rely on military power to support their foreign policy goals. For the United States to maintain, in concert with our allies, sufficient conventional forces to deter potential aggression, our forces must be provided with adequate numbers of new, modern tactical equipment.

My 1983 budget includes $106.2 billion for general purpose forces—including both operations and investment—an $18 billion increase over 1982. A key initiative is an expanded shipbuilding program. The United States, dependent on open seas for commerce and military resupply, must have the naval capability to maintain control of vital sealanes. While our naval forces have declined from the mid-1960's, the Soviets have in existence or under construction eight new classes of submarines and eight new classes of major surface warships, including nuclear-powered cruisers and new aircraft carriers.

The budget provides an $18.6 billion shipbuilding program including full funding for two nuclear-powered aircraft carriers, to be constructed during 1983-87. Other ships included in my 1983 program are three large cruisers equipped with an advanced air defense system; two nuclear-powered attack submarines; two frigates for convoy protection and four mine countermeasure ships to improve fleet capability to operate in mined waters. My longer term objective is to increase the deployable battle force from 513 ships in 1982 to over 600 by the end of the decade.

In addition, the budget provides for increased production of ground and tactical Air Force weapons. Production rates will be increased for a variety of new systems such as the M-1 Abrams tank, light armored vehicles, and the AV-8B Marine Corps attack aircraft.

All of this will be done with a major reform of the acquisition process and vastly improved management of defense operations, which will save $51 billion by 1987. In a continuing fight against fraud, waste, and inefficiency, the Secretary of Defense has appointed an Assistant for Review and Oversight and a Council on Integrity and Management Improvement.

REVITALIZATION OF AMERICAN FEDERALISM

The Constitution provides clear distinctions between the roles of the Federal Government and of the States and localities. In their wisdom, our Founding Fathers provided for considerable flexibility so that in following centuries these responsibilities could be adapted to new conditions. But in recent years we have not adapted well to new conditions. We have created confusion as to who is responsible for what. During the past 20 years, what had been a classic division of functions between the Federal Government and the States and localities has become a confused mess. Traditional understandings about the roles of each level of government have been violated.

Governments at all levels have had and will continue to face various problems. But, as Governor of California, I learned that a problem in one part of the country does not automatically mean that we need a new Federal program in all 50 States. Yet that is what has happened.

In 1964, total Federal grants to State and local governments were $10 billion. By 1980, total Federal grants to States and localities exceeded $90 billion, meaning that 18 percent of Federal tax receipts were being passed through to States and localities for one reason or another. However, these funds were not passed through entirely benignly. Attached to them were Federal rules, mandates, and requirements. This massive Federal grant-making system has distorted State and local decisions and usurped State and local functions.

I propose that over the coming years we clean up this mess. I am proposing a major effort to restore American federalism. This transition over nearly 10 years will give States and localities the time they need to plan for themselves when and how to meet State and local needs that are now being met with Federal Government funds. My proposal will also make available to the States and localities the tax resources that would otherwise fund these programs by the Federal Government.

In coming weeks, we will have intensive discussions with local and State officials, the Congress, and many others to hammer out a proposal I will soon sent to the Congress. Essentially, I believe the Federal Government should assume full responsibility for the medicaid program which assures adequate health care for the poor. In contrast, financial assistance to the poor is a legitimate responsibility of States and localities. I am proposing, therefore, that the aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) and food stamp programs be turned over to the States. This swap will clarify responsibilities substantially because these programs will become the clear responsibility of one level of government or another. That responsibility is now mixed.

In addition, I propose that more than 40 current grant-in-aid programs costing the Federal Government about $30 billion a year be turned back to the States and localities, along with the funds to pay for them. During the period 1984-87, these programs will be funded by a specially designated set of taxes to be used exclusively for financing this transition program. These taxes will be deposited in a fund that will belong to the States. Each State will be able to make its own decision on how rapidly to phase out the turnback programs. This is because each State will have two options: it may use its share of the federalism trust fund to reimburse Federal agencies for continuing to carry out turnback programs, or it may ask that the programs be terminated and then use the funds directly for whatever purposes it desires.

Beginning in 1987, the federalism trust fund will gradually be dissolved and the tax sources themselves will be made available to the States.

The key to this program is that the States and localities make the critical choices. They have the time to make them in an orderly way. A major sorting out of Federal, State and local responsibilities will occur, and the Federal presence and intervention in State and local affairs will gradually diminish.

CONCLUSION

While some administration proposals have been turned down, turned aside, or compromised by the Congress, the overall assessment of the past year's action on the budget is heartening. Cooperation, support, goodwill, and a genuine sense of national purpose have enabled us to make significant progress in setting the Federal Government's affairs in order and America on the road to economic recovery.

I urge the Congress to approach the new, or renewed, proposals in this budget in the same spirit and with the same goodwill as it did my proposals of a year ago. Much has been accomplished. This budget proposes that more be done.

The proposals set forth in this budget will not be accepted readily. They are a second challenging installment of a politically difficult, yet necessary, program. In their specifics, these proposals will undoubtedly be altered by the Congress. The general direction we must travel, however, is clear. I urge the Congress to weigh these budget proposals thoughtfully, and to join me, and my administration, in a constructive effort to curb the growth of Federal spending and to provide for the Nation's security. We must, in the end, roll up our sleeves, face our responsibilities squarely, and persevere at the unending task of setting, and keeping, the Nation's affairs in order.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BURDICK:

S. 2072. A bill to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949, to increase loan rates and price-support levels for the 1982 through 1985 crops of corn and wheat; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

INCREASE IN LOAN RATES AND PRICE SUPPORTS FOR CORN AND WHEAT

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, today, I am introducing a bill to amend the Agriculture Act of 1981 to provide more realistic price and income supports for America's wheat and feed grain producers with the same, and possibly less, budget exposure to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. President, my bill will change target prices for wheat to $4.50 for the 1982 crop; $4.75 for the 1983 crop; $4.90 for the 1984 crop; $5.10 for the 1985 crop. Price support loans for wheat will change to $4. Corn target prices will change to $3.15 for 1982 crop; $3.31 for 1983 crop; $3.48 for 1984 crop; $3.63 for 1985 crop. Price support loans for corn will change to $3. Other feed grains will continue to be set in relation to corn.

The Agriculture Act of 1981 recommitted the Federal Government to the dual market price and income support system used through much of the 1970's. Under that system, commodity loans are used to set a floor under the market price, and, as long as most of the farmers participate in the farm program, the commodity loan does set the floor in the market. The commodity loan program protects the Government. The target price supports producers' income. Producers are paid by the Federal Government for the difference between the higher of either the market price or the commodity loan price and the target price. As long as most farmers have an adequate incentive to participate in the farm program, the maximum budget exposure is the difference between the target price and the loan price. In the Agriculture Act of 1981 agreed to by the Congress and the administration, the budget exposure—the difference between the target price and the loan price—for wheat is $0.50 per bushel for 1982 wheat crop, expanded upward through 1985. The budget exposure for corn is $0.15 per bushel for 1982 crop, expanded upward through 1985. The difference between the price support loans for wheat and corn is $1 per bushel. The difference between the wheat and corn target prices for 1982 is $1.35 per bushel. Mr. President, those differentials are cast in law in the 1981 farm bill. Again, they have been agreed to by the President and the Congress. The bill I am introducing today would not change those differentials at all. The budget exposure under my bill would not be any higher than the exposure contained in the 1981 farm bill, and I will argue, could be substantially less.

Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture has used his authority to announce planting cutbacks of 15 percent for wheat and 10 percent for corn. The need is clear. We are facing record reserve levels of wheat and corn. Because of the farmer-owned reserve program, market prices are slightly above the loan rate today. It is obvious that if market prices are to improve, reduced plantings are necessary. I am predisposed to want acreage reductions to work, because I stood on this floor in December 1980 and was the only Senator that opposed ending enforcement of the normal crop acres provision of the 1977 farm bill for the 1981 crop. I predicted at that time a return to the fence-row-to-fence-row planting that led us to disaster in the farm economy earlier. But to accommodate the incoming administration, the normal crop acres provision was ended. Now we are back in trouble, and we have to reduce plantings.

To have a farm program work, sufficient incentives have to be available to producers to participate in the program. Obviously, if producers do not participate, the program fails. I am being told by farmers, and by commodity groups whose membership are farmers, that the farm program, as currently offered, will exclude many farmers from participation. In fact, I have seen estimates of below 50-percent participation down to as little as 20-percent participation. Farmers are telling me, and the USDA figures are backing them up, that the target price levels in the 1981 bill mean certain disaster if one participates in the acreage reduction program. To not participate means only likely disaster. Those farmers will have to plant all they can and risk their livelihood on a major drought in one of the other major grain-growing regions in the world.

If no adjustments are made in the farm program, and we have a 50-percent participation in that program, it means that the other 50 percent will be excluded from the commodity loan program. Again, the commodity loan program in this farm bill protects the Government. If half the producers do not participate in the loan program, the market price could be well below the loan level.

The Secretary has been instructed that the Congress expects him to continue to operate the commodity loans as nonrecourse both as to principal and interest. In other words, if the market price is below the loan price at the time the loan reaches maturity, the producer can elect to forfeit ownership of the commodity to the Federal Government. If only half of the eligible farmers participate in the 1982 acreage reduction program, we will probably not get the desired reduction in bushels of wheat and feed grains. So, it is possible that the market price could plunge below the loan rate. If that happens, first, farmers who have grain under a 1-year commodity loan may well elect to forfeit that grain to the Commodity Credit Corporation. Second, farmers who did not participate in the acreage reduction program would not be eligible for target price protection and would face economic disaster. Third, the government would become the owner of some grain valued at less than its acquisition cost, would lose more farmers and consequently, tax base, and would have to continue to make storage payments on grain in the reserve throughout the year with no prospect that the market price will reach the release level.

Obviously, the preferred course must be to provide an adequate incentive for farmers to participate in the 1982 acreage reduction program. Again, my bill will provide that incentive at no more budget exposure than we currently have and possibly less.

Mr. President, another reason for passing my bill is to address the income requirements of the modern farming operation. I don't think the irony was lost on anyone when the very next day after the Senate passed the administration's farm bill, it agreed to a resolution instructing the Secretary of Agriculture to forgo foreclosure proceedings on Farmers Home Administration farm borrowers. Those of us who argued throughout the course of last year for adequate farm income lost to those who argued that we have to cut the budget for all those things that affect rural States so we could give those moneys to the big industrial companies in the form of tax breaks to reindustrialize America.

I do not intend to review today our debate of last year on farm income, but farm income remains the key to the farm credit problem. Farm income remains the key to adequate conservation of our soil and water resource base. Farm income remains the key to some problems we are facing in rural banks. Farm income is the key to whether the administration's "New Federalism" is a bearable burden for most rural States.

Mr. President, the target price levels contained in this bill will allow some farmers to make a profit. But most will only break even and remain in the business for another 4 years.

Mr. President, the loan levels contained in this bill will protect the Government. The budget exposed remains the same. And by setting a higher floor under the market, we may actually realize a gain in our net balance of agriculture trade. Senator BENTSEN has undertaken an excellent discourse on the importance and nature of international trade in agricultural commodities. I intend to speak to that subject later. But for now, let me say that the United States tends to be the price leader in wheat and feed grains. The increasingly protectionist sympathies among our agricultural trading partners and competitors spring from their inability to compete with low wheat and feed grain prices.

To conclude, Mr. President, this bill clearly fits our national interest. Intransigence does not. Let's make these prudent changes at the earliest possible date. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2072

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 105B (a) (1) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1444d (a) (1)) is amended by striking out "$2.55" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3.00".

(b) The first sentence of section 105E (b) (1) (C) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "The established price for corn shall not be less than $3.15 per bushel for the 1982 crop, $3.31 per bushel for the 1983 crop, $3.48 per bushel for the 1984 crop, and $3.63 per bushel for the 1985 crop.".

Sec. 2. (a) Section 107B (a) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1445b-1 (a)) is amended by striking out "$3.55" and inserting in lieu thereof "$4.00".

(b) The first sentence of section 107B (b) (1) (C) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "The established price for wheat shall be not less than $4.50 per bushel for the 1982 crop, $4.75 per bushel for the 1983 crop, $4.90 per bushel for the 1984 crop, and $5.10 per bushel for the 1985 crop.".

By Mr. STEVENS:

S. 2073. A bill to repeal outdated size and weight limitations now imposed on the U.S. Postal Service; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

REPEAL OF POSTAL SIZE AND WEIGHT LIMITATIONS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would repeal outdated size and weight limitations now imposed on the U.S. Postal Service.

Many people do not realize that rural and small post offices have greater flexibility as to the size and weight of parcels the public may ship via the mails than those in cities. For example, a post office in nearby Herndon, Va., can accept parcels up to 70 pounds and 100 inches in length and girth. However, that same parcel cannot be accepted in the Washington, D.C., main post office, just four blocks from the Capitol. They can only accept parcels up to 40 pounds and 84 inches in length and girth.

My amendment would eliminate that discrepancy and allow any individual to mail a package of the maximum size in any post office, regardless of its location and the populace it serves. This relic of a restriction goes back to the days when the Railway Express Agency was still in business as a competitor to the U.S. Postal Service. In 1951, Congress enacted special legislation restricting the size and weight of parcel post which allowed the Postal Service to accept large parcels only where they were mailed at or addressed to small communities which did not have access to rail lines served by REA. This legislation was designed to help protect REA and divert the large parcel business to them.

Since REA went out of business in 1975, there is no justification whatsoever for the continued existence of this restriction, which discriminates against residents of this Nation's larger communities. There is simply no reason why people in Anchorage, Alaska, or Wilmington, Del., cannot send parcels just as large and heavy as those living in those smaller communities.

Recently, the J. C. Penney Co., in working with the Postal Service to try to upgrade its mail service, clearly pointed out that these outdated limitations are a real handicap for businesses. It is time we got rid of these archaic provisions.

Over the past 5 or 6 years, proposals to drop these outmoded limitations have been successfully added to various postal bills in the Senate and the House, without drawing any opposition whatsoever. But, for one reason or another unrelated to the parcel provision, the legislation has not made it all the way to the President's desk. This amendment provides for parcel limits to be set in mail classification proceedings just like letter mail size limits are now set.

I ask unanimous consent for the entire text of my bill to be printed at the end of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2073

"The Postal Service may establish size and weight limitations for mail matter in the same manner as prescribed for changes in mail classification under subchapter II of this chapter.".

(b) The size and weight limitations for other than letter mail established by subsections (a) and (b) of section 3682 of title 39, United States Code, as in effect on the day prior to the effective date of this section, shall remain in effect until changed pursuant to section 3682 of such title, as amended by subsection (a) of this section.

By Mr. JOHNSTON (for himself and Mr. LONG):

S. 2074. A bill to provide for the elimination of certain artificial restrictions on the consumption of natural gas, to provide for the elimination of certain restrictions on the sale and transmission of gas, to provide for the phased elimination of Federal price controls on natural gas, to provide remedies for certain contract provisions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

NATURAL GAS PRODUCTION AND MARKET ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1982

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, since the 1954 Supreme Court decision in Phillips Petroleum Co. against Wisconsin, this Nation has embraced the intricate and formidable task of regulating the production, consumption, transportation and pricing of natural gas. The merits and mechanics of this arduous undertaking have spawned hundreds of court cases, thousands of administrative proceedings, and have been the subject of protracted and often acrimonious debate here on the floor of the Senate.

The most recent foray of the Congress into the field of natural gas regulation was the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978. The result of that 18-month battle was a compromise between those seeking total deregulation of natural gas and those who favored extending regulatory controls. As with all compromises, the ideological purity of both sides became somewhat diluted, and, as one might expect with a subject of such complexity, a certain degree of confusion and distortion resulted.

The NGPA created over 20 different categories of natural gas depending on when, where, and by whom produced. Some of those categories were immediately decontrolled, some will be decontrolled in the future, and some will never be decontrolled. The act limits the access of some purchasers to otherwise convenient sources of supply while dictating to some producers those to whom they can sell. It mandates that some purchasers pay a higher price than others simply because of the use to which they put the gas, while limiting some producers to less revenues than others simply because of the nature of their production.

One's view of this complex regulatory scheme depends uniquely upon one's position in the marketplace. Yet, as the Senate Energy Committee's oversight hearings demonstrated last November, virtually everyone affected by the act, which includes virtually everyone, finds serious fault with its provisions.

Producers assert that the Federal price controls suppress the incentive to drill for gas in many regions where it might be found. This is borne out by the fact that last year's decontrol of oil led to an increase in oil well drilling of over 40 percent while natural gas drilling increased only about 7 percent.

Purchasers of natural gas allege that the multiplicity of Federal pricing schemes distorts the market, subsidizing some purchasers while unduly punishing others. Such is the inevitable result of price controls which have some gas selling for more than $9 per mcf while other gas sells for less than $1 per mcf.

Interstate pipeline companies have testified that contracts designed to cope with Federal price regulations contain escalator provisions which, under the current law, threaten to raise the acquisition cost of natural gas far above market clearing levels. Intrastate pipelines, on the other hand, complain that the inability to purchase certain categories of gas, such as that from the Outer Continental Shelf, unduly impairs their ability to meet supply obligations.

These problems, taken separately, indicate the perils of cumbersome Federal regulation. Taken together, they threaten an economic disaster the likes of which rival the 1973 Arab oil embargo.

Mr. President, in an effort to reconcile these problems and avoid such a crisis, we are today introducing the Natural Gas Production and Market Adjustment Act of 1982. This bill contains considerable input from all segments of the industry and is a genuine attempt to address their concerns. In addition, it incorporates certain fruits of the thoughtful negotiation process initiated by Congressman PHIL GRAMM.

This bill would provide for the phased elimination of price controls on all categories of natural gas. All gas produced from wells drilled after date of enactment would receive a price based on 70 percent of the average price, per million, Btu's, for crude oil acquired in that calendar quarter by domestic refiners. All other categories of natural gas subject to price controls would be phased up to that level over a 2-year period. On January 1, 1985, all categories of natural gas would be completely decontrolled, and the authority of the Federal Government to reimpose price controls would be terminated.

In addition, the artificial restraints on the consumption of natural gas contained in the Fuel Use Act and title II of the NGPA would be repealed. Intrastate pipelines would be placed on an equal footing with interstate pipelines by receiving the opportunity to purchase gas from the Outer Continental Shelf and from other inter- and intrastate pipelines. Both purchasers and sellers of gas who are parties to certain onerous contract provisions would be afforded the choice of operating under those provisions, renegotiating the contracts, or choosing a contract price based on the current market clearing level for gas produced from the same geographic region.

Mr. President, natural gas deregulation is a very complex and emotional subject. The combination of these two factors has resulted in a great misconception. That is, that the accelerated deregulation of natural gas will result in cost increases to consumers which would not otherwise occur. Nothing could be further from the truth. When the NGPA price controls expire on January 1, 1985, some 40 to 60 percent of our natural gas supply will more than double in price. Thus, the issue is not whether such price increases will occur, but whether they will occur suddenly and dramatically or on a gradual basis. By phasing in this price increase we can avoid an instantaneous and traumatic shock to our already fragile economy. By eliminating price controls on all categories of gas, we can insure that all consumers pay the same price rather than some consumers paying more in order to subsidize others who pay less.

Our experience with price controls on oil has shown that opponents of decontrol can paint pictures of consumer distress and economic woe which simply do not materialize. In this instance, however, those who oppose accelerated decontrol will be advocating a status quo which threatens economic disaster. We simply must take an objective and unemotional look at the facts.

Natural gas is a clearly superior fuel which represents our Nation's most valuable natural resource. Yet, it is the only natural resource which remains subject to Federal price controls. There are enormous quantities of natural gas which cannot and will not be produced until the proper incentives are provided. A phased deregulation of gas prices will result in added production and increased conservation—in short, a greater supply of natural gas. A free market, not Federal price controls, is the way to keep natural gas prices down.

Mr. President, the stakes involved in natural gas decontrol are enormous. This is not an academic exercise we can undertake at our leisure. The complexities of this issue are great, and the cost of delay will be greater. I urge my colleagues to join us and to help return natural gas to the free market which it has not enjoyed for 28 years.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and the accompanying section-by-section analysis be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill and analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(A) GENERAL RULE.—The term 'first sale' means any sale of any volume of natural gas—

"(i) to any interstate pipeline, intrastate pipeline, or to the transmission or distribution division of a pipeline, in the case of natural gas owned and produced by that pipeline;".

(b) Section 601 of such Act is amended—

(1) by amending the portion of subsection (b)(1)(A) which precedes clause (i) to read as follows:

"(A) FIRST SALES.—Subject to paragraph (4), for purposes of sections 4 and 5 of the Natural Gas Act, any amount paid (including, with respect to natural gas owned and produced by any pipeline, any wellhead value assigned by the pipeline to such natural gas) in any first sale of natural gas shall be deemed to be just and reasonable if—"; and

(2) by further amending subsection (c)(2) by inserting after "purchase of natural gas" the following: "(including with respect to natural gas owned and produced by any pipeline, any wellhead value assigned by the pipeline to such natural gas)".

CERTIFICATION FOR SPECIAL PRICING AND CONTRACT PROVISIONS

SEC. 307. Section 503 of the Natural Gas Policy Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) SELLER CERTIFICATION APPLICABLE FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES.—For purposes of sections 111 and 112, and paragraphs (11) and (12) of section 101(b), any certification made by a seller in a sworn statement to the Commission and the Federal and State agency having authority to make determinations referred to in subsection (a)(1) shall satisfy any requirements for a determination under this section.".

TREATMENT OF STATE SEVERANCE TAXES

SEC. 308. Section 110 of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3320) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) APPLICABILITY TO SECTIONS 111 AND 112.—The provisions of subparagraph (s)(1) shall apply to the same extent and manner as such provisions apply to maximum lawful prices under sections 102 through 109."

TITLE IV—CONTRACT PROVISIONS

EFFECT OF MAXIMUM LAWFUL PRICES ON CERTAIN CONTRACT PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. Section 101(b) of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3311(b)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new provision:

"(10) EFFECT OF MAXIMUM LAWFUL PRICES ON CERTAIN CONTRACT PROVISIONS.—For purposes of any contractual pricing provision, any maximum lawful price under this title shall be deemed to be a just and reasonable rate established by order of the Commission."

ELIMINATION OF AUTHORITY TO SPECIFY MINIMUM CONTRACT DURATION

SEC. 402. Section 315 of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3375) is amended by striking out subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) CONTRACT DURATION.—The Commission may not specify the minimum duration of any contract for the purchase of natural gas to which section 601(a)(1)(A) or (B) is applicable."

ELIMINATION OF AUTHORITY TO REQUIRE OFFERS AND RIGHTS OF FIRST REFUSAL

SEC. 403. Section 315 of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3375) is amended by striking out subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) OFFERS; RIGHT OF FIRST REFUSAL.—In the case of any person (or any successor in interest to such person) who but for the provisions of section 601(a)(1)(B) (relating to deregulation), would have been entitled to receive natural gas committed or dedicated to interstate commerce pursuant to such commitment or dedication if such gas were sold, the Commission may not require that such natural gas be offered to be sold to such person, either directly or through the granting of any right of first refusal of an offer made to any other person.".

CONTRACT CONVERSION RIGHTS

SEC. 404. (a) SELLER'S RIGHT TO CONVERT AREA RATE CLAUSES.—Section 101(b) of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3311(b)) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(11) CONSTRUCTION OF AREA RATE CLAUSES.—(A) In the case of any contract—

"(i) which was in effect on the day before the date of the enactment of this section; and

"(ii) which contains an area rate clause, the Seller under such contract may elect, not later than June 30, 1985, to have the price for natural gas under such contract be adjusted as if the contract contained the contract provisions set forth in paragraph (13) (in lieu of such area rate clause), until such time as the contract terminates or is renegotiated.

"(B) For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'area rate clause' means any contractual provision which bases the contract price for the first sale of natural gas on any Federally sanctioned or established rate or price, without regard to whether the clause specifies the identity of the Federal authority establishing or sanctioning such rate or price."

"(12) CONSTRUCTION OF COMMODITY ESCALATOR CLAUSES AFTER DECONTROL.—

"(A) GENERAL RULE.—In the case of any contract—

"(i) which was in effect on the day before the date of the enactment of this section; and

"(ii) which contains a commodity escalator clause, the Buyer under such contract may elect, not later than June 30, 1985, to have the price for natural gas under such contract be adjusted during the period this subparagraph applies to such contract as if the contract contained the contract provisions set forth in paragraph (13) (in lieu of such commodity escalator clause). In applying such contract provisions for purposes of this paragraph, the term 'Buyer' shall be substituted for 'Seller' and the term 'Seller' shall be substituted for 'Buyer', each place such terms appear. If the Buyer does not make a election under this subsection, the provisions of Section 313(b)(2), as amended by Section 405 of this Title, shall apply.

"(B) COMMODITY ESCALATOR CLAUSE.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'commodity escalator clause' means any provision of any contract which provides for the establishment or adjustment of the price for natural gas delivered under such contract by reference to prices paid for other fuels or commodities other than natural gas produced from within the United States, including refined petroleum products or crude oil."

(c) STATUTORY MOST FAVORED NATIONS CLAUSE.—Section 101(b) of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3311(b)) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(13) MOST FAVORED NATION CLAUSE APPLICABLE FOR PARAGRAPHS (11) AND (12).—The following contract provisions shall be applicable under paragraphs (11) and (12):

"1. The Seller shall have the right to make a written request for a redetermination of the price at which gas is to be sold under this Agreement. Upon Seller's request, the parties shall endeavor to agree to a redetermined price within six (6) months after Buyer's receipt of Seller's request (the redetermination period), or if they are unable to agree, such price shall be redetermined by arbitration pursuant to paragraph 3 hereof in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph 1. Such redetermined price shall be effective on January 1, 1985, in the event Seller requests a price redetermination within thirty (30) days before January 1, 1985. In the event Seller does not make such a request within thirty (30) days before January 1, 1985, the redetermined price shall be effective on the first day of the month following the earlier of (A) the expiration of one hundred twenty (120) days from the date of the notice or (B) the date on which redetermined price is agreed to by Buyer and Seller. Provided, however, in no event is the redetermined price to become effective prior to January 1, 1985. After the initial price redetermination under this Agreement, Seller may request further price redetermination during the remaining term of this Agreement at the end of each year following the effective date of a previously redetermined price. Each redetermined price, including the initial price redetermination, shall be based on an arithmetic average of the highest prices being paid for gas at the time of Seller's request for redetermination by each of three (3) different pipeline purchasers which may include Buyer if Buyer is one (1) of such three (3) with regard to a contract other than this one in the area involved pursuant to interstate contracts comparable to this Agreement in their terms and conditions, dedicated reserves, contract quantities, quality specifications, term of the contract, delivery conditions, delivery pressure, tax reimbursement, measurement, and point of delivery. In the event of redeterminations other than the original redetermination made pursuant to this paragraph 1, the redetermined price to be paid under this Agreement for the remaining term of this Agreement (subject to further price redetermination) shall be effective on sixty (60) days written notice by Seller of its intent to redetermine price under this Agreement, but in no event shall the subsequent redeterminations become effective prior to the anniversary of any previous redetermination period.

"2. In the event representatives of Buyer and Seller are unable to agree upon a redetermined base price or prices within a period of sixty (60) days of the written request for such redetermination, then either Buyer or Seller shall have the right to submit the matter to arbitration in the following manner: Upon written request for arbitration made by either party and served upon the other as provided by law, Buyer shall appoint one arbitrator and Seller shall appoint one arbitrator and the two arbitrators so appointed shall select a third arbitrator. If either Buyer or Seller shall fail to appoint an arbitrator within fifteen (15) days after such request for arbitration is made by the other party in writing, or if the two arbitrators so appointed shall fail within fifteen (15) days after the appointment of the second of them to agree on a third arbitrator, the arbitrator or arbitrators necessary to complete a board of three arbitrators shall be appointed upon application by either party therefor by the active senior (in service) U.S. Judge of the federal court having jurisdiction over the area in which the property covered by the Agreement is situated. After three arbitrators are appointed pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, they shall meet, hear the parties with respect to the matter of said price, and arrive at a determination of the price or prices at which gas is to be sold hereunder during the particular period in question. Any determination agreed to in writing by at least two of such arbitrators shall be final and binding on the parties hereto. All arbitrators appointed pursuant to this paragraph shall be individuals qualified by education, knowledge, and experience to determine the price of gas in accordance with the criteria set forth above and shall not be in the regular salaried employ of either party. The compensation and expenses of the the arbitrator named for the Seller shall be paid by Seller; the compensation and expenses of the arbitrator named for Buyer shall be paid by Buyer; and the compensation and expenses of the third arbitrator shall be paid in equal portions by Buyer and Seller.

"3. The term 'area', as used in paragraphs 1 and 2, means the areas defined for area rate purposes by the Federal Power Commission and set forth in section 154 of title 18 of the Code of Federal Regulations (as in effect February 8, 1982) or as set forth in an otherwise applicable rule or order which is no longer subject to judicial review. In the case of any geographical region not included in any such area, as so defined, such term means the county from which the natural gas is produced together with all counties adjacent to such county. In the case of any State or Federal geographical region not included in any such area, as so defined, the Secretary shall, by regulation, modify the definition of such areas to include such regions or establish new areas. In prescribing such regulations, the Secretary shall give due regard to boundaries utilized under other Federal laws and regulations in connection with oil and gas extraction."

EFFECT OF CERTAIN COMMODITY ESCALATOR CLAUSES ON MOST FAVORED NATION CLAUSES

SEC. 405. (a) Section 313(b) of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3373(b)) is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(b) OTHER TRANSACTIONS.—", by redesignating paragraphs (1) and (2) as subparagraphs (A) and (B) respectively, and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) Effective January 1, 1985, and terminating January 1, 1990, no price paid in any first sale of natural gas established under any commodity escalator clause (as defined in subparagraph (B) of section 101(b)(12)) for which an election is not in effect under section 101(b)(12) may be taken into account in applying any existing most favored nation clause."

(b) Section 313 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) DEFINITION OF EXISTING MOST FAVORED NATION CLAUSE.—For purposes of this section, the term 'existing most favored nation clause' means any indefinite price escalator clause which is in effect on the day prior to the date of enactment of this subsection and which provides for the establishment or adjustment of the price of natural gas delivered under the contract involved by reference to the price payable in other first sales of natural gas produced from fields or areas specified in such clause."

ESTABLISHMENT OF FAIR MARKET VALUE

SEC. 406. The price paid pursuant to any renegotiation of any gas purchase contract between non-affiliated parties existing as of January 1, 1983, where such renegotiations occurred not later than June 30, 1985, shall be deemed to be the fair market value of such gas for purposes of any law or lease provision. As to any renegotiation hereunder between affiliated parties, the price paid shall be deemed to be the fair market value if the price agreed to is not greater than the price agreed to by the same or similarly situated parties in comparable transactions between non-affiliated parties.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE NATURAL GAS PRODUCTION AND MARKET ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1982

TITLE I—ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN ARTIFICIAL RESTRICTIONS ON NATURAL GAS CONSUMPTION

Sec. 101 repeals the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act effective upon date of enactment. However, such repeal shall not apply to powerplants or fuel burning installations which, prior to enactment, have received proposed or final prohibition orders under Titles II or III of the Fuel Use Act.

Sec. 102 terminates the incremental pricing requirements of Title II of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (NGPA), effective on date of enactment. All interstate pipelines and local distribution companies subject to the requirements of Title II shall comply with Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) orders for effectuation of such termination.

Sec. 103 repeals Title III of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978, relative to retail policies for natural gas utilities. Such repeal is effective on date of enactment.

TITLE II—ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS ON NATURAL GAS SALES AND TRANSMISSION

Sec. 201(a)-(h) eliminate the limitations on natural gas sales and transmission under Section 311 of the NGPA. Section 311 currently allows sales only from intrastate pipelines to interstate pipelines and local distribution companies. As amended, it would allow sales from any pipeline to any other pipeline or local distribution company.

Sec. 201 (i) provides incentives for interstate pipelines to transport gas sold under Section 311 by mandating that the revenues from such transportation shall not be offset against that pipeline's cost of service to existing interstate customers.

Sec. 201 (j) deals with "Hinshawed" pipelines and is the only section which amends the Natural Gas Act. It provides that if the provisions of Section 1 (c) of the NGA do not apply to a pipeline by reason of subsection 1 (c) then neither shall those provisions apply to any other person purchasing gas from such pipeline solely by reason of such sale. Thus, a pipeline not otherwise subject to FERC Jurisdiction may purchase gas from a Hinshawed pipeline without, itself, becoming Hinshawed.

Sec. 202 amends Section 601 of the NGPA to provide that as of January 1, 1985, the requirements of abandonment and dedication of natural gas are no longer applicable. In addition, it provides that gas from wells drilled after enactment of the Natural Gas Production and Market Adjustment Act (NGPMAA) shall not be deemed dedicated to interstate commerce.

Sec. 203 (a) amends Section 601 of the NGPA to provide that gas which is produced from the Outer Continental Shelf and sold to an intrastate pipeline or local distribution company shall not be dedicated to interstate commerce.

Sec. 203 (b) further amends Section 601 of the NGPA to allow any intrastate pipeline or local distribution company to purchase gas produced from the Outer Continental Shelf.

Sec. 204 (a) authorizes a pipeline or local distribution company to assign, without compensation, all or a part of its rights to receive surplus gas to any other pipeline or local distribution company.

Sec. 204 (b) defines surplus gas as that portion of gas in excess of what is required to meet the current demands of any pipeline or local distribution company.

Sec. 205 (a) amends Section 302 of the NGPA to eliminate certain restrictions on the President's emergency purchase authority. As amended, section 302 would allow the President to authorize any pipeline or local distribution company to purchase emergency supplies of natural gas from any other pipeline, local distribution company or producer of natural gas.

Sec. 205 (b) amends Section 303 of the NGPA to eliminate certain restrictions on the President's emergency allocation authority. As amended, Section 303 would authorize the President to allocate supplies of natural gas to and from any pipeline or local distribution company.

TITLE III—NATURAL GAS PRICING PROVISIONS

Sec. 301 adds a new Section 111 to the NGPA relative to gas produced from wells the surface drilling of which began after the date of enactment of the NGPMAA. For all such wells, the maximum lawful price, as of January 1, 1983, shall be equal to the crude oil reference price. The crude oil reference price is that estimated by the Secretary of Energy to be equal to 70 percent of the weighted average cost, per million Btu's, for crude oil acquired during that calendar quarter by domestic refiners. However, this maximum lawful price shall not apply with respect to gas which qualifies as high cost gas under Section 107(b)(1)-(4) of the NGPA.

Sec. 302 adds a new Section 112 to the NGPA to provide for the phased elimination of federal price controls on all categories of natural gas other than those in Sections 111 and 107(c)(1)-(4) of the NGPA. The price for each category covered by Section 112 will be phased up in monthly increments to the crude oil reference price. The phase-up period will begin in January 1983 and continue through December 1984.

Subsection (d) of this section provides that for categories of gas established under Section 107(c)(5), which reference other categories of natural gas for pricing purposes, the maximum lawful price shall be determined without regard to Section 112 unless otherwise determined by the Commission.

Sec. 303 provides that as of January 1, 1985, all first sales of natural gas shall be free from federal price controls. In addition, the NGPA authority regarding reimposition of price controls is repealed.

Sec. 304 provides that prices paid for natural gas by interstate pipelines may be passed through to the purchaser except where the price is deemed excessive due to fraud. Thus, the amorphous limitations on cost passthrough in instances of "abuse or similar grounds" are eliminated.

Sec. 305 preempts any state or local law which would preclude cost passthrough by an interstate pipeline.

Sec. 306 provides that gas owned and produced by a pipeline shall be covered by the definition of "first sale" as defined in Section 2(21) of the NGPA.

Sec. 307 provides that for purposes of sections 111 and 112, and paragraphs (11) and (12) of Section 101(b) of the NGPA, a sworn statement by a seller of natural gas shall satisfy the determination requirements of Section 503 of the NGPA.

Sec. 308 declares that State severance taxes shall not be considered in determining the maximum lawful price for gas under section 111 and 112 of the NGPA.

TITLE IV—CONTRACT PROVISIONS

Sec. 401 provides that for purposes of any contractual pricing provision, the maximum lawful price under this title shall be deemed to be a just and reasonable rate established by the Commission.

Sec. 402 eliminates the authority of the Commission under Section 315 of the NGPA to specify the minimum duration of any contract for the sale of natural gas.

Sec. 403 eliminates the authority of the Commission under Section 315 of the NGPA relative to offers and rights of first refusal.

Sec. 404(a) provides that in the absence of renegotiation of a natural gas contract containing an area rate clause, the seller may elect, not later than June 30, 1985, to have the price of the natural gas under such contract to be governed by the statutory most favored nations clause set forth in subsection (c)

Sec. 404(b) provides that in the absence of renegotiation of a natural gas contract containing a commodity escalator clause, the buyer may elect, not later than June 30, 1985, to have the price of the natural gas under such contract to be governed by the statutory most favored nations clause set forth in subsection (c).

Sec. 404(c) defines a statutory most favored nations clause as the average of the three highest prices being paid by each of three different pipeline purchasers for gas from the same area. The three contracts referenced must be comparable to the contract at issue in their terms and conditions, dedicated reserves, contract quantities, quality specifications, term of contract, delivery conditions, etc. The term "area" means the areas defined for area rate purposes by the Federal Power Commission and set forth in 18 C.F.R. 154. Any such election by either buyer or seller must occur prior to June 30, 1986, and in no event shall the price determined under the statutory most favored nations clause apply prior to January 1, 1985.

Sec. 405 amends section 313(b) of the NGPA to provide that no price paid for gas under a commodity escalator clause may be considered in determining the price to be paid under any existing most favored nations clause (as defined herein).

Sec. 406 provides protection for buyers and sellers of natural gas who renegotiate their contracts. It declares that the renegotiated price shall be deemed to be the fair market value of such natural gas for purposes of any law or lease provision.●

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 2075. A bill to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act to increase the investment yield on U.S. savings bonds to a level competitive with 52-week Treasury bills; to the Committee on Finance.

TAKE STOCK IN AMERICA ACT OF 1982

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act in order to permit the Treasury Department to fix the interest paid to U.S. savings bond holders at a rate that is more competitive with other investment opportunities available to small investors.

This measure is similar to H.R. 4853, a bill introduced in the House by Congressman ROTH.

Under present law, the Treasury Department is prohibited from increasing the interest rate on savings bonds by more than 1 percent during any one 6-month period.

Until November of 1980 the interest rate on Series EE savings bonds was fixed at 7 percent. On November 1, 1980, the Treasury Department increased the rate to 8 percent and then to its current level of 9 percent on May 1, 1981.

The Treasury Department did not use its authority to increase the rate up to 10 percent on November 1, 1981. Instead, it announced that it planned to seek legislation to permit Treasury to vary the savings bond rate with market rates.

Mr. President, in 1979, savings bond redemptions exceeded sales by over $5 billion, over $11 billion in 1980 and by over $10 billion in 1981. The maximum rate increases of 1 percent per 6-month period permitted under existing law have not been sufficient to stem the savings bond cash drain from the Treasury because of higher interest rates available from other market instruments.

These cash drains from the savings bond program must be financed by other, more expensive Treasury borrowing; namely, the issuance of additional securities at interest rates much higher than the savings bond rate. Indeed, interest rates on Treasury marketable intermediate notes and bonds have been as high as 16 percent in recent months.

In order to stem this cash drain, the Treasury must assure savings bond investors that they will receive a fair rate of return throughout their holding period. Thus, the Treasury must be able to promise investors that the rate on savings bonds will vary with market rates of interest.

The alternative of raising the savings bond rate to, say, 10 percent now and possibly a higher rate later, under existing legislation, was rejected by the Treasury last November.

While such rate increases may reduce the savings bond cash drain in time, they would be relatively expensive to the Treasury over the long run if market rates of interest declined.

The answer is simple. We need a savings bond rate that automatically increases, and decreases, with market rates. And Treasury cannot offer such a bond under existing law.

Mr. President, over the years millions of Americans, including many of our servicemen and women, have invested in savings bonds. The payroll savings plan has been a vehicle for personal savings for the small saver for decades.

Unfortunately, savings bonds have become a losing bargain because Congress has failed to act to insure a fair rate of return on the bonds. Why should the average investor purchase a savings bond at 7-, 8-, or even a 9-percent rate of return when he or she can simply invest in money market funds or small CD's with a 13-, 14-, or 15-percent rate of return. Again, the answer is simple. Unless our average investor plans on losing money, he or she will definitely seek the highest return possible. And that eliminates U.S. savings bonds from consideration.

The legislation I am introducing today will in effect, peg the series EE savings bond rate to a rate equal to 85 percent of the yield on 52-week Treasury bills. The savings bond rate of return will vary according to changes in the T bill rate of return.

This measure will insure a fair return to Americans who have historically trusted the U.S. savings bond program as a secure investment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2075

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph (3) of section 22(b) of the Second Liberty Bond Act (31 U.S.C. 757(c)) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), the Secretary of the Treasury shall fix the investment yield on any United States savings bond at a yield which makes such bond competitive with comparable investments; provided, however, that in no event shall the investment yield on such bonds exceed 85 percent of the average investment yield for the most recent auction (before the week in which the certificate is issued) of United States Treasury bills with maturities of 52 weeks."

SEC. 2. The amendment made by section 1 hereof shall apply with respect to interest accrual periods beginning after the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. LAXALT:

S. 2076. A bill for the relief of Oikos, Incorporated, and the Nevada Opera Association, both of Reno, Nevada; to the Committee on Finance.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ORGANIZATIONS IN RENO, NEV.

● Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, on behalf of my distinguished colleague, Senator Cannon, and myself, I introduce a bill which will deem both the Oikos Inc., Reno, Nev., and the Nevada Opera Association, Reno, Nev., from having not filed a valid waiver under sections 3101 and 3111 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

I introduce this measure as a means of relieving both organizations of a burden brought about by a set of paralleling, extenuating circumstances. Each organization, respectively, provides the Reno community with greatly needed cultural and rehabilitative services. In no way does this measure carry the intent to restructure the basic provisions of the code as they were adopted. Rather, it addresses the difficulty that such organizations encounter when dealing with complicated regulations with which they have had no prior experience.

Knowing that an enforcement of the penalties issued to both organizations would result in the termination of their existence, I urge that this measure be acted upon favorably by the Senate so that the Reno community may continue to receive their services which, to date, have been nothing less than successful.●

By Mr. HART:

S. 2078. A bill to prohibit the use of funds for the production of lethal binary chemical munitions; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PRODUCTION OF LETHAL BINARY WEAPONS

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, today I am offering a bill to prohibit the expenditure of any funds from the fiscal year 1983 defense budget for the production or deployment of a new generation of "binary" chemical weapons. I intend to offer this legislation as an amendment to the Defense appropriations bill at the appropriate time.

Today, the Senate has received notification from the President of the United States that he intends to authorize the production of a new generation of chemical weapons. By so doing, the President has signaled the intention of this administration to begin the actual construction of "binary" chemical munitions in the near future.

I oppose this decision. As I have said in the past, the more one is concerned about Soviet capabilities in chemical warfare, and the threat they pose, the more one should seek effective, practical military counters to this threat. The critical issue is how best to respond to the Soviets. The production of binary chemical weapons is not essential to the national security, nor is it necessary to deter Soviet first use. Our current stock piles are adequate for that purpose. Our principal emphasis should be the acquisition of additional protective and defensive equipment for U.S. combat forces to reduce the effects of a chemical weapons attack.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2078

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) notwithstanding any other provision of law, no funds may be obligated or expended after the date of the enactment of this Act for the production of lethal binary chemical munitions.

(b) As used in this subsection (a), the term "lethal binary chemical munitions" shall have the same meaning given such term in section 818(b) of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1976 (Public Law 94-106; 50 U.S.C. 1519).●

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. DOLE, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LUGAR, and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S.J. Res. 143. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of May 2 through 8, 1982, as "National Physical Fitness and Sports for All Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS AND SPORTS FOR ALL WEEK

Mr. THURMOND. I am introducing today a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of May 2 through May 8, 1982, as "National Physical Fitness and Sports for All Week." I am pleased to have Senators BAUCUS, DOLE, GRASSLEY, HATCH, LEAHY, LUGAR, and MOYNIHAN join with me as cosponsors of the resolution.

We have come a long way from the time when physical exercise was viewed mainly as an entertainment diversion. Today, a significant segment of the American population is involved in the growing fitness movement in this country. Physical activity has become an important part of daily life for people of both sexes and all ages.

One of every two adults in the United States engages regularly in exercise and sport. A third of us swim, a fourth ride bicycles, and a fifth play one of the racket sports. Running has more than 20 million adherents. It is interesting to note that the number of physically active men and women has doubled in 10 years, and continues to grow rapidly.

Typically today, interest in physical activity begins at an early age, and presently, nearly 30 million boys and girls take part in age-group team sports and other organized out-of-school activities. More than 6 million teenagers and over 600,000 college students compete in athletic programs.

Our physical fitness and sports programs are one of the primary means by which we strengthen and refresh ourselves. It is essential that we publicize such programs and make them increasingly available so that all of our citizens will be able to experience the benefits they offer. Accordingly, I am sponsoring this resolution, which requests President Reagan to declare May 2 through 8, 1982, as "National Physical Fitness and Sports for All Week."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the resolution be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 143

Whereas one of every two adults in our country is a regular participant in exercise and sports;

Whereas the number of physically active men and women has doubled in ten years and continues to grow rapidly;

Whereas today we recognize that physical activity is an important part of daily life for people of both sexes and of all ages;

Whereas physical activity is vital to good health and is a rich source of pleasure and personal satisfaction;

Whereas our physical fitness and sports programs are one of the primary means by which we strengthen our bodies and refresh our spirits; and

Whereas it is essential that we make fitness and sports programs increasingly available so that all of our citizens will be able to experience the joys and benefits they offer: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of May 2 through 8, 1982, as "National Physical Fitness and Sports for All Week", and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 2079. A bill to require that Poland be declared to be in default unless certain liberties and rights are found to be restored in Poland before payments are made by the U.S. Government for loans owed by Poland or credits which have been extended to Poland which have been guaranteed or assured by agencies of the U.S. Government; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

POLAND'S DEBTS

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation that would place Poland in default of its international debt.

Specifically, my bill would require that Poland be declared in default before any payments could be made by any U.S. Government agencies, including the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Export-Import Bank, to individuals or corporations in satisfaction of any debts incurred by Poland and guaranteed by these Government agencies.

The need for this legislation is self-evident. On January 29 the administration put in place an extraordinary policy that would permit the Commodity Credit Corporation to pay banks the amounts Poland has failed to pay them for guaranteed loans—without declaring Poland to be in default of its debts. The administration thus chose not to use the leverage this debt had given the United States to encourage an acceptable political accommodation in Poland. In the words of the Wall Street Journal editorial of February 3:

It looks as if the battle for freedom in Poland is going to have to be taken to the floor of the U.S. Congress.

My bill will provide Congress that opportunity.

I look forward to an early debate in the Senate on this question, Mr. President.

For the information of Senators, I ask unanimous consent that my legislation be printed in the RECORD following the insertion of several analyses of the Polish debt.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb. 3, 1982]

CONGRESS'S CHANCE ON POLAND

It looks as if the battle for freedom in Poland is going to have to be taken to the floor of the U.S. Congress. With Ronald Reagan's administration slipping into tacit collaboration with martial law by making it easier for the Soviet bloc to finance repression, any serious action against the Polish regime will have to be taken by another branch of government.

It turns out that the administration, far from calling in the Polish debt to hamper the flow of credit to the Soviet Union and its satellites, is bending U.S. law to keep Poland out of bankruptcy. The Commodity Credit Corporation provides government guarantees to banks financing grain shipments abroad, offering to repay the banks if foreign governments cannot. For ordinary, non-Communist governments, no payment is made until the bank declares the loan in default. But in the case of Poland, this was deemed too embarrassing.

So the State Department lobbied to change the CCC rules, and the administration decided to pay off $71 million to the banks without their declaring a formal default. This is a down payment on about $400 million in guarantees on Polish loans due this year. No sooner is the decision taken than Secretary Haig rushes off to Chicago to spend Solidarity Day posturing before Polish voters as a tough guy on Poland.

One point that begs attention is how this decision was reached. At what level of the government was it decided? Did the President understand the full implications of the change in the rules? Did the National Security Adviser? Where was the Treasury? (The undersecretary for monetary affairs says he's under instructions not to discuss the issue.) Was the Defense Department even consulted? Was this the foreign policy equivalent of the decision to change the tax status of segregated private schools? Everything we learn leads us to suspect that the answers to these questions would be profoundly embarrassing, that this is another example of sloppy management at the White House.

A second point concerns the banks. They have refrained from declaring a default in Poland because the writedowns would hurt their earnings. It would also hurt their chances of doing new business with the Communist dictators of Poland and the rest of the Soviet bloc. But the real question is how did U.S. and other Western banks make all these bad loans, and how can we stop them from doing it again?

The banks have made the loans because Western governments encouraged them to do so, implicitly suggesting that loans to Communists had a favored position, deserved lower rates and would more or less be backed by Western governments. The CCC deal can only encourage this notion. The Soviets rushed to get the gas pipeline deal and other credits wrapped up before the Polish crackdown, and with the new incentives just demonstrated by the Reagan administration, the flow of credit will resume again as soon as the bad press dies down.

The U.S. government ought to at least stay neutral toward Communist loans. The Polish loans clearly are sick, and probably terminally so. The banks ought to be establishing large reserves against them—we have previously suggested 50%—as a matter of pure commercial prudence. The government ought to be encouraging them to do this, not helping them avoid it, to limit the commercial damage from any forceful foreign policy initiative. Instead, the Reagan administration sponsors a TV show.

Fortunately Congress will have an opportunity to show greater forcefulness, for it controls the power of the purse and bail-out money has to come from somewhere. Specifically, it would come from House Joint Resolution 389, a budget-busting supplemental appropriation of $5 billion for the CCC. This measure has been marked up—with unseemly haste—in the agriculture appropriations subcommittee by the Mississippi Democrat, Jamie Whitten. The main purpose is to provide pork for American farmers, who are calling on their CCC entitlements because of low farm prices. But a lot of the money—between $500 million and $1.5 billion, so far as we can learn—could be used to bail out repression in Poland.

It would not be the worst thing in the world if this whole supplemental were grounded, farm price supports being one of our least favorite subsidies to the landowning poor. But if Congress is going to bail out the American farmer, it can at least write in an amendment prohibiting the use of these tax funds to bail out Polish dictators, at least until a default is declared and the economic lessons of Poland digested.

DEFAULT IS REAGAN'S

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4—With all due solemnity, the White House press office has declared that the memo quoted in this space a few days ago—revealing national security adviser Clark's order to secretly circumvent regulations requiring that Poland be placed in default—was a leak of classified information, subject to the latest lie-detector rules.

This is an illustration of the arrogance of ignorance. Mr. Clark evidently thinks that his power to stamp "secret" on documents affecting national security extends to documents that are merely politically sensitive. By confusing what is genuinely secret with what is politically embarrassing, he abuses his power to classify.

For example, his order to protect Poland from normal default procedures was passed along to at least seven major American banks at noon Friday of last week. The Polish junta was promptly informed; the West German banks were notified; the Kremlin knew all about it. The only people not in on Mr. Clark's "secret" was the American people, whose tax money was being used to make good Poland's debt.

Moreover, Mr. Clark's improper use of his classification power could have made it possible for bank insiders to benefit from information denied to the investing public. The $71 million payment was good news for worried bankers; perhaps bank stock activity was wholly unrelated to this development, but the Clark abuse of secrecy made a mockery of S.E.C. "full disclosure" requirements.

The abuse of the classification power was compounded by the cover-up that followed. A party line was propounded at State that turned truth on its head: the cave-in to the junta's financial needs was described in testimony to Senate Percycats as a triumph of toughness. Default, went this Orwellian argument, would let the debtor "off the hook"; only by preventing default, insisted the Secretary of State, could we recover our money.

In the case of sovereign nations, that alibi is palpably false. Countries are not corporations with limited liability; when Poland defaults, it must make good on its debts before getting credit again. The same with Rumania, next on the Clark-Haig list for largesse. Default is sustained and serious pressure, and is not relief from pressure. Nor are we trying to recover money; we are trying to end martial law. The Reagan Administration is deliberately misinforming American taxpayers on this at great risk to its own credibility.

William Clark, hailed as a problem-solver, is thus creating great problems with his secrecy-sycophancy and alibi-cooking. For another example, take the case of William Van Cleave, a long-time policy adviser to candidate Reagan.

The outspoken Mr. Van Cleave was denied a job at State by Haig détenteniks and shut out of Defense by Frank Carlucci, the lie-detector king. As a sop to hard-liners, the campaign deputy to Richard Allen was named to head the advisory board on arms control, even after he made clear in writing he would continue to dissent on the MX decision.

This week, Mr. Clark called Mr. Van Cleave into the White House and said that even the sop would be denied. "The vote was 3 to 1," sympathized the new national security adviser. It seems that Messrs. Baker, Deaver and Meese—there's a bunch of foreign policy experts—had opposed Mr. Clark on the nomination. Soft-liner Percy's opposition turned out to be more important than hard-liner Eugene Rostow's support. Strangely, Ronald Reagan was never asked to cast a vote.

To conservatives, Mr. Clark put forward the alibi that only Mr. Van Cleave's publicly expressed dissent to MX blocked him from the post he had afterward been promised. That is demonstrably false, but as in the case of the Orwellian explication, Mr. Clark sticks to his story and further erodes his credibility.

What is Bill Clark's game? By pandering to the President's irritation with dissenters and whistle-blowers, he undermines the tottering troika; by tolerating the humiliation of Mr. Van Cleave, he gains the chance to substitute Donald Rumsfeld in that slot and thus to send a chill through Al Haig.

But he is not knowledgeable enough to take charge himself; no interviewers are permitted to probe his thoughts, thereby to suggest that still waters may run shallow. Why, then, is President Reagan bringing Mr. Clark along so fast?

My guess is that the President wants an amiable no-liner to make peace between the high-riding détenteniks and the gloomy hard-liners at Defense, so that he can continue to concentrate on those domestic challenges that interest him most. Next year, he may figure, will be time enough to bring in a second wave of foreign policy makers.

What a mistake. Americans threw out Jimmy Carter because they believed him to be uncertain and impotent on the world stage. Next year will be too late for the creation of a coherent foreign policy. Default, dear Brutus, is not in our advisers; as abuses grow and alibis fly, the blame is placed in the Oval Office.

No, It Would Only Hurt Some Foolish Banks

(By George F. Will)

Everyone needs a hobby, and Teddy Gleason's hobby is stiffening U.S. foreign policy. He is head of the International Longshoremen's Association, and if the Reagan administration will not seriously restrict trade with the Russian and Polish regimes that are brutalizing Poland's labor movement, Gleason's men may do it, as they have before.

Gleason's foreign policy would be a distinct improvement on the government's. The government has paid $71 million to U.S. banks in lieu of interest payments Poland owes on loans the U.S. government guarantees. The payment was contrary to the law, which requires prior notice of default. Indeed, the purpose of this surreptitious payment was to prevent Poland from being declared in default, which would disrupt East-West trade and efforts to resuscitate détente.

"The United States," says Secretary of State Alexander Haig, "has made it clear that we will not do business as usual with either Poland or the Soviet Union while repression in Poland continues." Indeed, it is highly unusual to ignore U.S. law in order to subsidize Poland's martial law. To do otherwise, Haig says, would "bring down the temple of Western unity." Temple? All that would be brought down would be the earnings of some foolish bankers.

Eastern Europe's economies, which help sustain Russia's war economy, have received Western loans four times the value of all American aid to Western Europe during the Marshall Plan. Russia is so pressed for hard currency it is asking Japanese and West German companies to stretch out payments for goods shipped to Russia. Yet, as The Wall Street Journal says, the administration is "slipping into tacit collaboration with martial law by making it easier for the Soviet bloc to finance repression."

Even before the $71 million payment, administration policy regarding Poland was dismally congruent with the general Western response, which The Economist magazine says will be remembered as the Great Handwringing of 1981–82. Democrats are noticing the opportunity to pluck from the administration's palsied grasp the falling flag of national honor, and to do so by opposing bankers on behalf of a large ethnic group.

Haig has had his way with the U.S. response to Poland's crisis and has become a hostage to fortune. He says the crisis has just begun and America must hold all serious measures in reserve for when the going gets rough. But what additional suffering by Poland could provoke action from people who worship at the "temple" of allied unity?

In Cuba, Russia long ago repealed the Monroe Doctrine and now, with the recent arrival of heavy bombers, advanced fighters and 63,000 tons of war material, it is shredding whatever is left of whatever agreement was reached at the end of the missile crisis 20 years ago. Haig is adamant, and correct, concerning the need for difficult decisions about El Salvador and the source of much other violence, Cuba. But he seems oblivious to certain problems inherent in the conduct of foreign policy in a democracy—oblivious to the practical consequences of symbolism, and to the demoralizing symbolism of America's policy regarding Poland.

Always, but especially when the president is preoccupied with domestic policy, the nation needs a secretary of state with some of Dean Acheson's attributes—someone articulate, intellectual, elegant, ironic, at ease with himself, and justifiably confident of his ability to argue America's case before skeptical elites at home and abroad. The Achesonian combination of attributes is rare, but Haig's lack of them is a problem compounded by a policy toward Poland that is certain to confuse and paralyze the nation's will. In the early 1970s, the rhetoric and other atmospherics of détente—the "end of the Cold War," "an era of negotiation, not confrontation," accords on "principles of conduct"—subverted public support for diplomatic and defense measures arduous enough to prevent détente from becoming what it became: a recipe for American retreat and an incitement to Russian expansionism. Haig then understood the problem and was a corrective force.

Today, administration policy regarding Poland is generating similar confusion and lassitude that will color defense and foreign policy debates generally. Haig argues that paying Poland's interest charges is really the "tough" policy because it keeps Poland under the burden of debt. That argument is entertainingly brassy, but it is too clever by half, which means it is not clever at all. Even if it were true, it would be politically unwise.

Someone who argues that subsidizing Poland's generals is toughness will find that when he turns to talking of other, more recognizable, forms of toughness in Central America, the public is not deferential, or comprehending, or even attentive.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no funds may be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to any private individual or corporation in satisfaction of any assurance agreement or payment guarantee or other form of loan guarantee entered into by any agency of the United States Government with respect to loans made and credits extended to the Polish People's Republic, unless either—

(1) the Polish People's Republic has been declared to be in default of its debt to such individual or corporation, or

(2) the President certifies to the Congress that civil liberties and the rights of free trade unions have been restored in Poland to such a degree that it would be appropriate for the United States Government to promote commerce with Poland in order to protect and expand those liberties and rights.

Sec. 2. The President may delay implementation of this Act for up to 30 days after the date of enactment if he determines, and so notifies Congress, that to do so would be necessary and desirable in order to coordinate the response by monetary authorizes in the United States and in member countries of the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development to a Polish default.●

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL

AMENDMENT NO. 1254

(Ordered to be printed and lie on the table.)

Mr. MATHIAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S.J. Res. 95) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the supervision and approval of the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial Commission, to proceed with the construction of the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial, and for other purposes.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am today reporting Senate Joint Resolution 95 from the Rules Committee. Senate Joint Resolution 95 authorizes the construction of the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial.

As reported, Senate Joint Resolution 95 would be subject to a point of order on the Senate floor under section 402(a) of the Budget Act. To avoid this problem and also to avoid the necessity of a budget waiver, I intend to offer an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 95 when the resolution is taken up on the Senate floor to make it clear that any sums authorized would be "for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1982." It never was the intention of the Rules Committee to have any sums expended on this memorial in fiscal year 1982.

I have today written to Senator DOMENICI, chairman of the Budget Committee, telling him of my intention to offer the clarifying amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 95.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 95 and my letter to Senator DOMENICI be printed in the RECORD along with these remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On the first page, line 4, strike out "approved" and insert in lieu thereof "approval".

On page 2, line 4, strike out "March 2, 1978" and insert in lieu thereof "September 20, 1979".

On page 2, line 13, insert "for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1982" immediately after "appropriated".

FEBRUARY 5, 1982.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
Chairman Committee on the Budget, Washington, D.C.

DEAR PETE: Enclosed you will find a copy of S.J. Res. 95 and a proposed amendment to S.J. Res. 95.

The Rules Committee, at its markup on January 25, 1982, ordered reported S.J. Res. 95. S.J. Res. 95 authorizies and directs the Secretary of Interior, subject to the supervision and approval of the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial Commission, to proceed with the construction of the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial, and for other purposes. Section 3 specifically states, "There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution".

Since S.J. Res. 95 is being reported from the Rules Committee after May 15, 1981, and, as written, authorizes new budget authority for Fiscal Year 1982, it would be subject to a point of order on the Senate floor under Section 402(a) of the Budget Act.

In order to avoid this problem and also to avoid the necessity of a budget waiver, I intend to offer the enclosed amendment to S.J. Res. 95 when the resolution is taken up on the Senate floor. The amendment would make clear that any sums authorized to be appropriated would be "for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1982".

I hope this letter is sufficient for the purposes of the Budget Committee, in order to avoid the necessity of a budget waiver resolution. It was never the intention nor the thought of the Rules Commmittee that any sums would be expended for this memorial in Fiscal Year 1982.

I appreciate your assistance in this matter.

Sincerely,

CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, JR.,
Chairman.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

CBO REEVALUATES CONDITION OF SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUNDS

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for most of last year we heard from some of our colleagues that proposals to restore the solvency of the social security trust funds were actually poorly disguised attempts to balance the Federal budget. They justified inaction on social security reform on the grounds that the trust funds would remain sound through the 1980's, needing only the modest adjustment of interfund borrowing. CBO projections were used to substantiate these claims.

Last week's news that CBO now projects the social security system will be insolvent in fiscal year 1984 leads me to wonder. Could those who opposed real reform have actually been that naive, failing to heed the many caveats contained in trust fund projections, or were they just playing politics? In either case, it seems worthwhile to point out some of the facts that anyone involved in social security financing, at least since 1977, already knows.

The accuracy of any projection is predicated on the economy performing in a very precise way. CBO's projections last year, for example, which showed solvency being barely maintained through the 1980's with interfund borrowing, required inflation in the 6- to 7-percent range, unemployment in the 7-percent range, and healthy expansion in the economy. It was clear that the slightest deviation from these projections in the economy would threaten the system with insolvency. As Dr. Alice Rivlin said in testimony before the Joint Economic Committee last fall:

> The margin for error is very small • • • if economic conditions are even slightly worse than now projected, legislative action beyond interfund borrowing would probably be necessary.

Today, just 4 months after Dr. Rivlin testified, CBO now reports that the social security trust funds are likely to be insolvent by the end of 1983 or early 1984. Rather than reviving in 1986 and 1987, as earlier estimates showed, the trust funds are now projected to continue deteriorating.

I do not mean to suggest that we now know, on the basis of CBO revised estimates, that bankruptcy will occur on a given date in 1983 or 1984. What I am suggesting is that insolvency during the 1980's is highly likely and that we have had plenty of warning that more substantial action than interfund borrowing is necessary. Every year since 1977, when we enacted legislation that was said to be restoring solvency well into the next century, trust fund projections have become progressively gloomy. In 1980, before social security became the political issue, even the House Democratic Study Group warned that the system was headed for difficulties that a reshuffling of assets could not solve.

Then, of course, we heard from the Social Security Board of Trustees who reported last fall that insolvency was likely in the mid-1980's. Under their pessimistic or "worst case" projections—those that were so highly criticized by some in this body as administration scare tactics—insolvency was projected as early as late 1983.

It has been obvious to responsible observers for some time that trust fund reserves must be replenished and then maintained at levels capable of withstanding short-term fluctuations in the economy. This, after all, is the purpose of reserves—insuring the timely payment of benefits to the 36 million recipients despite unexpected changes in income or outgo.

Views differ on what is an adequate level of reserves. The National Commission on Social Security recommended a level of reserves equal to 100 percent of annual outgo, or 1 year's worth of benefits; the 1979 Advisory Council on Social Security recommended 75 percent. Our current level of reserves—just 20 percent of outgo, or barely 2 months' worth of benefits—is well below these targets and critically depleted by historical standards. It was not until 1970 that the reserve ratio first fell below 100 percent.

Now that CBO has put their stamp of approval on bankruptcy projections, perhaps we can refocus the social security debate—away from the question of when and if bankruptcy will occur and toward the only important question of how to restore the financial integrity of the system.●

EXPRESSION OF RESPECT FOR REPRESENTATIVE JOHN DINGELL

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, on January 28, 1982, I placed in the RECORD a statement concerning H.R. 5252. Appended to that statement was an editorial from the Los Angeles Times.

I regret that inclusion of the editorial may appear to endorse improper and offensive criticism of my distinguished colleague, Representative JOHN DINGELL.

While we may disagree on legislative issues from time to time, my respect for the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee is unwavering. I want to make it clear that the editorial comment is not consistent with my sentiments.●

PHILIP ORTH CO. CENTENNIAL

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to call to the attention of my colleagues the centennial anniversary of one of Wisconsin's finest firms, the Philip Orth Co.

This company, based in Oak Creek, Wis., has been under the dedicated and far-sighted leadership of three generations of the Orth family. The company has grown from a small milling and grain enterprise to become one of the leading suppliers of custom food processes, bakery mixes and bases to the commercial bakers of the Nation and the world.

The Philip Orth Co. now stands out as a national leader in the industry as a corporation possessing sound leadership, advanced research and product development, innovative sales and marketing strategies, streamlined manufacturing facilities, and a dedicated family of employees.

The company looks to the future with great promise. They have the people and products that will meet the challenges of future business and market conditions with the flexibility and determination that have been the hallmark of its first 100 years.

I am sure that my colleagues in the Senate join me in saluting one of the Milwaukee area's proudest establishments on this historic achievement. I wish them the best on their next century of service to Wisconsin and the Nation.●

SRI LANKA

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, on February 4, 1982, the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka celebrated its 34th year of independence. I wish to congratulate the people of Sri Lanka and their President, the Honorable J. R. Jayewardene, on this happy occasion.

Sri Lanka has distinguished itself as a country committed to the same democratic principles of government that the people of the United States hold so dear. The laws of Sri Lanka guarantee every adult the right to vote and include women at all levels of national politics. A unicameral Parliament legislates on behalf of the different ethnic and religious groups that comprise Sri Lankan society, and the President does not have the power to veto its decisions. Sri Lanka's constitution embodies all of the clauses of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations. It mandates a strict separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government and includes other time-tested principles of government found in the constitutions of the United States, Great Britain, and France.

The present government of Sri Lanka is dedicated to promoting economic self-sufficiency and self-help. As a nonalined nation, its relations with other countries are characterized by consideration, cooperation, and constructive dialog. I wish the people of Sri Lanka all the best as they enter their 35th year of independence and trust that the friendship between our two countries will continue to grow.●

OAG ARTICLE ON AIRLINE DEREGULATION IN MIDWEST

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I would like to address an issue which affects every region of the country but which has had special ramifications for the Midwest—airline deregulation. The Airline Deregulation Act has been in effect for several years now. Commuter airlines across the country are currently struggling to fill the vacuum left in rural areas by departing commercial carriers, and legislation is being considered for early sunset of the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Federal agency primarily responsible for the efficient and orderly transition to deregulation. In light of these developments, I would request that an article published in the January 1982 edition of the Official Airline Guide/Frequent Flyer be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. This article entitled "Air Traveler Woes in the Upper Midwest," outlines the problems of service cutbacks and excessively high fares which the upper Midwestern States, including my home State of South Dakota, now face.

Although many Government officials maintain that airline deregulation has consistently improved the service and fare structure offered to consumers, this article presents some convincing evidence to the contrary. Some predictions made during the debate on airline deregulation have now come true. The major commercial carriers have moved quickly to discontinue service in low-density areas. Certainly these changes were necessary to assist an industry which has suffered severely during these times of economic hardship and uncertainty. However, the areas which have lost service have also suffered because of the difficulty in finding adequate replacement service. As the OAG article explains, nationwide figures are deceptive. Many regions have actually seen an increase in air service, but it is important to note that these areas are primarily communities with high density traffic. The story is much different in the upper Midwest. Seven small Midwestern hubs, including Sioux Falls, S. Dak., have experienced a 12-percent decrease in departures while the national average for small hubs' departures has actually increased slightly. South Dakota also has five nonhubs with air service. In this category, the upper Midwest has experienced a 25-percent decrease in departures while the national average has only declined by 1.5 percent.

In anticipation of this loss of service, Congress included in the Airline Deregulation Act a provision for "essential air service" needs in these smaller towns. However, even with these statutory assurances, rural communities have experienced problems. For instance, a partial loss of commercial service does not automatically qualify a town to receive "essential air service" designation. Commercial service is a major attraction to businesses and industries wishing to locate and develop in smaller communities. If even some of this air service is lost, the negative economic impact on the community can be devastating. Furthermore, even when the CAB makes the "essential air service" designation, commuter airlines just now entering the market must struggle to provide acceptable service. The economic situation in this country today, coupled with the dislocation and cutbacks of service due to the air traffic controllers strike, has created serious obstacles for small commuter airlines attempting to provide replacement service.

In addition to the loss of service, our small hubs and nonhubs in the upper Midwest are facing massive price hikes on airline tickets. It is generally understood that short-haul routes are in fact more expensive to operate. However, the disparity in ticket prices can be astounding. Flights between large and small hubs in the Midwest can be much more expensive than a flight of equal or greater distance between two large hubs. For example, a one-way coach class ticket from New York to Los Angeles can be purchased for $225. But a traveler going from Sioux Falls, S. Dak., to Los Angeles via Minneapolis must pay $311. This is a 38 percent price difference. And one must remember that the Sioux Falls traveler has fewer transportation options available to him.

Clearly, airline deregulation has not helped States like South Dakota. Higher fares and reduced service have been the result again and again. The industry maintains that low levels of passenger traffic necessitate cuts in service and increases in ticket prices. However, passenger levels could be higher in these rural areas if lower fares and dependable service were offered. It is a continuous and damaging economic cycle which the private and public sectors must address.

The article follows:

[From Official Airline Guide, Frequent Flyer Magazine, January 1982]

AIR TRAVELER WOES IN THE UPPER MIDWEST

Before its passage in 1978, opponents of the Airline Dergulation Act argued that smaller communities would face sharp cutbacks in scheduled air service if carriers were permitted easy exits from unprofitable markets. Perhaps nowhere was this fear more prevalent than in Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota.

Now that deregulation is a fact of life, there is evidence to back up the claim that the upper Midwest has been more severely hit by cutbacks than other regions of the country. According to the CAB statistics, between April 1978 and April 1981, small hubs—airports emplaning .5 percent of national traffic—recorded a nationwide gain of .8 percent in the number of scheduled departures. Yet during the same period, the seven small hubs in the upper Midwest—Bismarck, Fargo, Green Bay, Madison, Rapid City, Rochester (MN) and Sioux Falls—experienced a 12 percent decline in the number of departures.

The rate of decline for nonhub airports was even more severe. Nationwide, the number of departures at nonhubs dropped 1.5 percent. Yet, in the upper Midwest, there were nearly 25 percent fewer departures at nonhubs in April 1981 than in April 1978. The CAB estimates that the number of available seats in these markets dipped approximately 20 percent. What's more, seven communities in the four-state region lost air service entirely, while only one—Dickinson, ND—gained service.

Because of sparse load factors, many routes in the region are subsidized by the CAB. The largest subsidy operator in the country, Republic Airlines, is also the principal regional carrier in the upper Midwest. Yet in the past several months, Republic has been dropping many of its subsidy routes. In 1981 alone, the carrier announced plans to suspend service to twelve smaller cities in the four-state region.

"To cut off a large number of these marginal cities is really not in conformity with our basic operating philosophy," explains Republic spokesman Walt Hellman. "Yet even with the subsidies, these are cities at which we cannot operate profitably. With load factors so low, it really doesn't make sense at all to continue service."

As an example, Hellman cites the case of Pierre, South Dakota, the state's capital (population: 9,699). According to Hellman, each of Republic's two daily flights to and from Pierre averaged less than three passengers. Even the South Dakota Department of Transportation concedes that such flights are money losers for major carriers. "I'm sure if Republic were making money at such cities, they'd want to stay," says Dan Parish, Jr., air service specialist for the department.

Of course, Republic isn't the only carrier to withdraw from markets in the upper Midwest. During the past year, Western, Frontier and Air Wisconsin have all notified the CAB of service suspensions.

Largely because Congress was so concerned about cutbacks to smaller communities, the region will continue to receive at least some air service. Under the essential air service provision of the Airline Deregulation Act, even after a carrier announces intent to withdraw from a market, it must continue to serve the route until the CAB can locate a replacement carrier. Usually, such a replacement is a commuter airline. Mesaba Aviation, for example, replaced Republic at Mankato, MN. And Republic's departure from four South Dakota communities—Pierre, Brookings, Huron and Mitchell—triggered the formation of an entirely new commuter, Northern Airlines, which now links these cities with Minneapolis.

Not all communities welcome the change. Says Hellman, "A lot of cities feel their status is greatly enhanced if they're served by a major carrier as opposed to a commuter airline." Yet because commuters can operate at far lower costs, they can often provide greater scheduling frequency. Says Dan Parish, "The pullouts by Republic have caused a rather severe turmoil in the short term, but in the long run we may end up with better and more frequent air service."

Although commuters may increase the levels of service in the region, they won't solve yet another dilemma triggered by deregulation: steep air fares. On October 1, a roundtrip coach ticket between New York and Los Angeles was priced at $600 (24¢ per mile). A Supper Saver on the same route sold for $450 (18¢ per mile). Yet during the same period, a roundtrip coach ticket between Minot, ND, and Los Angeles was priced at $622, or 46¢ per mile. No Supper Saver fare was available. Because such steep fares reflect the lower load factors and higher operating costs of providing air service to the upper Midwest, that price disparity is not likely to disappear in the near future.●

A TRIBUTE TO MARIAN HAYES MILLER, A DEDICATED PROFESSIONAL IN THE FIELD OF AGING

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, as ranking minority member of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I would like to take this opportunity to commend a dedicated professional and a well-known advocate for the needs and concerns of older Americans, Marian Hayes Miller. It is indeed an honor to commend Mrs. Miller for her activities on behalf of our Nation's 36 million older persons.

Marian Hayes Miller, who served as regional program director, Administration on Aging, region V, Chicago, Ill., from July 1972 until February 1982, is deserving of special mention on the occasion of her new assignment outside the field of aging. Mrs. Miller has done work on behalf of older persons since 1968 when she first joined the Administration on Aging.

Her early responsibilities with the Administration on Aging resulted in the design and publication of a policy and procedures manual for State agencies on aging which were just then emerging as a force in the developmental phase of the aging network. Mrs. Miller had a major role in the development of viable professional career education and inservice training programs—training so necessary at that time—for the emerging field of gerontology. Her efforts helped to build programs for gerontological training and education in scores of universities and colleges, which in turn recruited and trained thousands of persons for careers in aging, while retraining still others already working with or on behalf of the elderly.

Mrs. Miller provided invaluable staff work in the preparation of, what is known throughout the national network on aging as, the Green Book which was used until recently as a guide for the development and management of the highly successful nutrition programs for the elderly. She assisted in the development of the multipurpose senior center program. Through her technical assistance efforts to State and area agencies on aging, she has been responsible for improving the quality and quantity of community-based social services to the elderly. Mrs. Miller has indeed done a remarkable job and performed as a highly visible and effective advocate for the elderly during that period of development when the network on aging grew to 57 State and territorial offices on aging, 610 area agencies on aging and more than 25,000 local service providers. Her dedication as an able advocate for the elderly, and her support of and interest in programs such as legal services for the elderly, the advocacy assistance program, protective services, congregate housing, day care for the elderly and others, has significantly contributed toward the growth and development of community programs which now serve the elderly of our great country.●

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Therefore, I submit for the RECORD the rules of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

1. Regular meetings shall be held on the first and third Wednesday of each month when Congress is in session.

2. Voting by proxy authorized in writing for specific bills or subjects shall be allowed whenever a majority of the committee is actually present.

3. To assure the equitable assignment of members to subcommittees, no member of the committee will receive asssignment to a second subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members of the committee have chosen assignments to one subcommittee, and no member shall receive assignment to a third subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members have chosen assignments to two subcommittees.

4. Six members shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of transacting committee business: Provided, That for the purpose of receiving sworn testimony, a quorum of the committee and each subcommittee thereof shall consist of one member.●

TRAGEDY CONTINUES IN EAST TIMOR

● Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, on December 16 of last year I spoke of the tragic situation in the former Portuguese colony of East Timor, which 6 years ago was invaded by Indonesia. I referred to accounts from Roman Catholic sources reporting a recent Indonesian military offensive in the territory which could lead to food shortages in the coming months. In addition, I stressed that these potential shortages would occur among a population still recovering from the Cambodia-like catastrophe that struck their island nation from 1978 through 1980. I also suggested that food stockpiles be established in East Timor to prevent further disaster.

Last month, additional information became available on the food situation from media coverage in Australia, a close neighbor of East Timor. These accounts were based on an urgent appeal from Monsignor Martinho do Costa Lopes, the Apostolic Administrator of East Timor, to the head of Australian Catholic Relief, calling for food assistance to avert a possible famine. The Australian Government responded immediately with a pledge of 1,000 tons of corn for the Catholic, Relief shipment.

However, Australian Catholic Relief has not been permitted to enter East Timor to supervise the distribution of the aid shipment, and at present, there are no international relief agencies in the territory on a full-time basis. The director of Australian Catholic Relief, Mr. Michael Whitely, appealed to the Indonesian Government in mid-January to "allow Australian aid agencies into East Timor to see the situation for themselves and to assess how they might cooperate in the establishment of normal conditions there." I would like to register my support for this appeal as well as for any others that may come from qualified, independent international relief groups that are prepared to work in East Timor.

Recently, the Timorese Bishop made it clear that Indonesian military action was responsible for the deterioration of the food situation. He pointed out that Timorese villagers were forced by the Indonesian army to participate in operations aimed at rooting out continuing guerrilla resistance to Indonesian rule, taking able-bodied men away from normal agricultural activity, with the result that there will at best be a poor harvest, at worst a famine. Australian Catholic Relief affirmed that the Bishop's information corroborated what the organization already knows from other sources. On January 14, 1982, the respected Australian daily, The Melbourne Age, offered another account supporting this version of events; which, I should add, reached me from other sources.

In my December 16 statement for the RECORD, I also drew attention to a November 1981 account by a distinguished Timorese Roman Catholic cleric, who charged Indonesian troops with committing gruesome atrocities. A January 1, 1982, article in the Far Eastern Economic Review underscores the seriousness of the situation. It tells of a report written by Indonesian-appointed members of the East Timor "Popular Assembly" set up by Jakarta after the 1975 invasion of the territory. The report, which was sent to Indonesian President Suharto last June, says, for example, that assembly members were "continually, with deep sorrow, receiving verbal as well as written reports or complaints from the people about torture, maltreatment, murders and other unimaginable cases." Curiously enough, the day after the report was first discussed publicly in the U.S. Congress, at a hearing in the House of Representatives, the authors of the report were arrested. Fortunately, the Timorese assemblymen were later released, largely through the efforts of Indonesian human rights attorney Muliya Lublis of the Jakarta-based Legal Aid Institute.

It is significant to note that, according to an account from Reuters news agency, the document prepared by the Timorese assemblymen is "similar to a secret report compiled recently by Catholic priests in Timor for the Vatican." I would like to remind my colleagues that the Timorese were installed in their positions by Indonesian authorities.

The existence of this and other information only confirms my belief that a neutral international presence is needed in East Timor, to help protect the civilian population from further violence as well as to distribute food and medicine. It also confirms my belief that in the long term, a just political settlement in accordance with international law is the only viable solution to the East Timor problem.

Mr. President, for the benefit of my colleagues I ask that the following articles from the Canberra Times, the Melbourne Age, and the Sydney Morning Herald be printed in the RECORD; together with the article from the Far Eastern Economic Review.

The articles follow:

"THREAT OF FAMINE" IN TIMOR

SYDNEY.—Substantial international assistance will be needed to prevent famine breaking out in Timor this year, according to the Australian Catholic Relief agency.

It has received urgent requests for aid from the island's capital, Dili, where hundreds of thousands of Timorese have gathered to avoid Indonesian military operations in country areas.

Monsignor Martinho Da Costa Lopes, the Roman Catholic Church's administrator in Dili, said in a letter to ACR that food shortages already were serious and that many farmers had been killed.

He said that the continued presence of Indonesian soldiers was to blame for the disruption to the island's subsistence economy, and confirmed that a major operation to flush Fretilin forces from mountain areas was a substantial cause of the current shortages.

The national director of ACR, Mr. Michael Whiteley, said yesterday that the monsignor's explanation corroborated "what we already had known and heard from other sources".

Monsignor Lopes said that the Indonesian soldiers forced all able-bodied men between the ages of 15 and 50 to form a "human fence" through the Fretilin-controlled territory to keep the resistance fighters and their families on the move.

Many Timorese were killed in the operation, which took place in July, August, and September last year.

They included women and children and 300 people were said to have been killed in a four-day siege at a local shrine, the Rock of St. Anthony.

The removal of the men from their villages prevented the planting of crops and those who returned were often too weak to work. Some crops were planted but this was too late.

"The result will be at least a poor harvest—at worst, a famine", Monsignor Lopes wrote. "This conclusion is inescapable as the people now can do nothing to increase food production for at least six months".

There are no international relief agencies in Timor. The Red Cross and the US Catholic relief services wound up their work in April last year and the distribution of aid has been left to the local Catholic Church.

Mr. Whiteley said that ACR had allocated about $90,000 for 1981 and this year to the East Timor emergency rehabilitation program, but church relief workers had requested $250,000 mainly for food, medicine and care for orphans.

There are an estimated 550,000 people on Timor, and the majority are in and around the relative safety of Dili. This is placing great pressure on the resources of the capital and disrupting agricultural work.

AUSTRALIA TO SEND CORN TO INDONESIA FOR TIMOR

(By Scott Milson and Malcolm Brown)

The Federal Government announced yesterday that it would give 1,000 tonnes of corn to Indonesia to help avert food shortages in Timor.

It was a day of angry accusations and pleading by Australian aid officials to have direct access to Timor, countered by replies from the Indonesian Embassy in Canberra that there was not a critical food shortage and aid was going through normal channels.

The Australian Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Street, said yesterday that the corn, valued at $430,000, was being given in response to a request in November from the International Committee of the Red Cross.

The announcement was brought forward following the urgent appeal at the weekend from the Roman Catholic representative in Dili to the Australian Catholic Relief agency to avert possible famine in Timor.

In addition to the food, the Australian Government has decided to give $45,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross to maintain its operations in the territory till mid-year.

Mr. Street said yesterday that Timor was an area where food supplies were traditionally precarious. He would not comment on reports that Indonesian military operations had adversely affected food supply in Timor.

In Sydney, the national director of Australian Catholic Relief, Mr. Michael Whiteley, said the facts as he knew them suggested that the Indonesian Government was deliberately trying to starve out Fretelin guerillas hiding in the countryside.

"I appeal to the Indonesian Government to allow Australian aid agencies into East Timor to see the situation for themselves and to assess how they might co-operate in the establishment of normal conditions there," he said.

Mr. Isslamet Poenomo, the Indonesian Embassy's press attache in Canberra, said yesterday that his Government's policy was straightforward on the distribution of relief.

"The procedure is to give relief or aid to Indonesia and especially Timor through the Indonesian Red Cross," he said. "To give directly to East Timor will not be allowed."

TIMORESE FACING STARVATION, SAYS SMUGGLED LETTER

(By Jim Brumby)

A letter smuggled out of East Timor, written by an opponent of Fretilin has confirmed reports of the Indonesian army using Timorese peasants to fight guerrillas, and warns of impending starvation.

The letter's author, who now works in the Indonesian bureaucracy, sent the letter to his cousin in Melbourne at the beginning of December. It was handed over to The Age yesterday by Mr. Cliff Morris, a translator of Timorese stories. The letter was written in Portuguese.

In chronicling the events since the Indonesian invasion in late 1975, the letter draws particular attention to the "corral campaign," dubbed the "fence of legs" by the Timorese.

It says: "Since July the most depressing and painful drama in the history of the Timorese people has taken place—the corral campaign. All males from age seven to 60 have been conscripted to take an active part (in flushing out the guerrillas).

"The campaign embraces the whole of the territory, from Lapsalos to the border. The Indonesian propaganda is impossible, it says 'East Timor is integrated with Indonesia'—but why then has this war been going on for six to seven years?

"It shows the people do not want foreign domination. Why is there a nation of 150 million inhabitants fighting with one of a ½ million—something one would think impossible to imagine or fantasize about, but it is happening.

"More and more people suffer, but it will not be in vain. At the middle of the suffering, the Indonesians are perceived as murderers, intruders, evil treaters, oppressors, robbers and more. This will continue."

The author says the corral campaign began in most sections of the country in the first week of July. It involves Timorese walking in front of the Indonesian army in the search for guerrillas—hence the title "fence of legs."

Mr. Morris said the mass conscription of Timorese men had led to a break in the subsistence food chain and would cause mass starvation. He said this was a deliberate strategy of the Indonesians.

The letter continues: "It has brought social and political discontent. Many have been treated badly. There is murmuring revolt in so many—but in vain. Many good men have been banished to the islands which act as prison camps—often because they have relatives who are still in the woods.

"Economically the campaign has brought total misery for the people. It has caused a failure in agriculture. How in general can a population continue to survive when produce like rice, maize, cassava, potatoes et cetera are deficient? As well, the produce which grows on the plains is not gathered because there is nobody there to gather it."

EAST TIMOR BRUTALITY CONTINUING

LONDON, Wednesday (AAP).—East Timorese refugees arriving in Lisbon say mass executions and indiscriminate brutality are continuing in their homeland, six years after Indonesia invaded the former Portuguese colony, it was reported in London yesterday.

Jill Jolliffe, writing for The Guardian said that, according to refugees who recently arrived in Portugal through a precarious escape route from Dili, fighting was still going on between Indonesian troops and Timorese nationalists led by Fretilin, the Revolutionary Front of Independent East Timor. Arrests and arbitary imprisonments were also continuing.

Amnesty International has been monitoring the situation since the invasion, and its list of East Timorese who have disappeared or allegedly been executed is growing.

Jill Jolliffe said the refugees were bitter that the world community was vocally indignant about Afghanistan but appeared to have forgotten them.

In recent months, the territory had been the scene of a new military offensive by the Indonesian Army. The result, according to a Roman Catholic Church source in Dili, had been the execution of about 500 civilians late last year.

According to Jill Jolliffe, the resistance has survived the most devastating Indonesian military onslaughts over six years, and the population at large appeared as opposed to the occupation as it was in 1975.

JAKARTA'S CAN OF WORMS

(By Michael Richardson)

The Jakarta-appointed provincial assembly in Indonesia's East Timor province has warned that corruption, brutality and other abuses of power by some in the army and administration are causing growing fear and anti-government feeling in the territory. The warning came in an assembly report addressed to President Suharto. And its leakage led to the arrest in November of the two assembly representatives who signed it—Leandro Isaac and Sousa Soares. They were later released.

Their lawyer, Muliya Lubis of the Jakarta-based Legal Aid Institute, told the Review he had heard that two other Timorese had also been arrested, one of them a member of the provincial assembly, Francisco Dios Himines. Lubis said he had not been able to confirm this, though other sources in indonesia also believe there have been four arrests.

They had heard that Oscar Lucio Goncalves, a close relative of East Timor's Governor Guilherme Goncalves, had been taken into custody. Goncalves was one of the leading supporters of the integration of East Timor into Indonesia when the territory was still under Portuguese colonial rule in the early 1970's. The provincial assembly has about 24 members, handpicked as supporters of integration in July 1976.

Publication of the provincial assembly report, which complains of economic hardship as well as malpractices, is an embarrassment for the Indonesian Government. It confirms that there is deep disenchantment in East Timor. An English-language translation of the report begins by claiming that the people of East Timor are "forever indebted and grateful" for the incorporation of the Portuguese colony into Indonesia. But it goes on to say that some people from elsewhere in Indonesia—most of them military personnel—who had come to the province, were guilty of "great brutality" and abuse of power. They were ignoring local customs and behaving as "conquerors."

The report says that the East Timor provincial assembly "is continually, with deep sorrow, receiving verbal as well as written reports of complaints from the people about torture, maltreatment, murders and other unimaginable cases. The basic laws in this province are controlled by certain individuals or groups who place their personal interests above the interests of the people as a whole . . . feelings of fear are widespread . . . with the result that the living conditions of the people have worsened."

So far the Indonesian Government has made no comment about the reported arrests of the two signatories of the assembly report, though the news has been carried in both the Indonesian and foreign press. But on December 22, the speaker of the Indonesian parliament, Daryatmo, criticised their arrest. He said he had discussed the matter with the national security chief, Adm. Sudomo.

The Legal Aid Institute earlier challenged the arrests on the grounds that under the law members of both central and provincial assemblies are supposed to be immune from arrest. Daryatmo said detention of any assembly member should have the approval of Suharto after consultation with the speaker of the parliament in Jakarta. "The authorities should not act arbitrarily and they should abide by the procedures and law of the government," he added.

An Indonesian source familiar with the case told the Review that Isaac and Soares brought copies of the report, dated June 3, 1981, to Jakarta in late August or early September, staying about a week. They were unable to see the president to give him a copy, though it is believed he subsequently saw the report. They also gave a copy of it to the Indonesian parliament.

Lubis said the two Timorese assemblymen were arrested on November 18 in Dili by members of Kotis, a special operations group of the army in East Timor. They were later taken to Denpasar in Bali, where the commander for the military region that includes East Timor, Brig. Gen. Dading Kalbuadi, has his headquarters. Lubis said he had not been able to contact his clients or get official permission to visit them.

There has been no official word on who ordered the arrests or why, but the Jakarta daily newspaper, Merdeka, reported that the two men were detained for allegedly allowing copies of the assembly report to reach foreign organizations, diplomats and news media. An English translation first appeared in the September issue of a monthly bulletin issued by Tapol, a British-based group that campaigns for political detainees in Indonesia. The government claims the Tapol organization is communist-influenced. The bulletin included a photostat copy of the covering letter in Indonesian to Suharto from the assembly. It was signed on behalf of the chairman by Isaac as the youngest member and Soares as the oldest.

Observers believe the army in East Timor made the summary arrests in an attempt to prevent criticism of Indonesia from spreading. General elections are to be held in May 1982 and they will be the first in East Timor since its incorporation. In a speech on December 22, Suharto called on the people of Indonesia to ensure that the polls do not disrupt national unity.

The East Timor assembly report accuses several Indonesian army units stationed in the territory of killing Timorese, mainly for practising "black magic." This presumably refers to the traditional animist religion of the bulk of the Timorese population. Most members of Indonesia's army are Muslims or Christians.

It cites two cases involving two battalions in which several people allegedly were killed. The report charges that in Viqueque district "inhabitants were murdered after being tortured by having their sex organs slashed because they did not obey orders serving the interests of certain individuals or groups and also because of black magic practices." It claims that in Likisa district people "were murdered by the sub-district military command after being tortured with electricity and other forms of burning . . ."

The report continues: "These murders and acts of torture committed by these irresponsible persons or groups have resulted in a situation of instability throughout . . . East Timor where there have been many reactions, fears and a variety of other feelings. Furthermore, in a situation where there are no legal restraints and no discipline, problems relating to morality occur, such as in Dili where several women in a prison were tortured with electricity and burnt cigarettes by some elements of the armed forces, who also inflicted immoral sexual acts upon them." The report does not say when these alleged abused took place.

It goes on to say that though "quite a lot of financial assistance has been received from the central government in Jakarta for development of East Timor, the Timorese people have not yet felt any real benefits." It complains that an army-controlled enterprise, P. T. Denok, has a monopoly on trading in two of East Timor's main export commodities—coffee and sandalwood (Review, May 23, 1980)—and says the company pays very low prices for what it buys.

Three leading non-local government officials in East Timor are specifically accused of corruption, including squandering project funds and diverting medicines sent from abroad for private gain.

The report ends as it begins, on a conciliatory and loyal note. It says the damage to the "fine, high ideals" of the Indonesian armed forces in East Timor is being caused by "a mere handful of individuals." The purpose of the report is to "help create a good name and respect for the Indonesian armed forces in the eyes of the people of East Timor."

The assembly hoped that Suharto "will be gracious enough to rectify these distortions which can lead to unrest and anxieties among the people and native officials of East Timor . . ."

AUSTRALIA BOOSTS FOOD ASSISTANCE TO TIMOR

(By Teresa Mannix)

The Federal Government announced yesterday that $430,000 worth of food aid would be sent to Timor, despite assurances by the Indonesian Government that no famine existed.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Street, said 1,000 tons of corn would be shipped to Dili within the next few weeks.

Including freight, the aid was valued at about $430,000.

Mr. Street's announcement follows a report by a senior Roman Catholic representative in Dili, Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, that a serious food shortage was looming in Timor because Indonesian troops had disrupted the economy.

A Foreign Affairs spokesman said yesterday that Timor had always been a "food problem" area and that the Government had been approached by the Red Cross last month to set up "buffer" supplies of food which could be drawn on during bad harvests. Because of the current publicity about a possible famine in Timor, yesterday seemed an appropriate time to announce new arrangements.

Mr. Street said the grain buffer stock had been established with the agreement of the Red Cross and the Indonesian Government. It was to supplement any shortfall in the province's current harvest. In addition, Australia had contributed $45,000 to support the involvement of International Catholic Relief in the province until at least mid-1982.

Australia would continue to give sympathetic consideration to any further requests for assistance.

A spokesman for the Indonesian Embassy in Canberra said yesterday that his Government was annoyed by the reports of a famine.

"We deny this allegation", he said.

He said Monsignor Lopes had met Indonesian President Suharto in August last year and had pledged his support to the Indonesian Government. He could not understand why Monsignor Lopes had written a letter saying there was a famine.

There were special boards in the major Timorese towns to monitor food supplies and to distribute food when necessary. A good rice harvest was expected this year and the Government had spent a great deal of money developing Timor.

Monsignor Lopes said Indonesia's campaign against Fretlin troops was taking farmers away from their fields, and the harvest was suffering.

The embassy spokesman said the military campaign was purely voluntary, and no villager was compelled to enlist. Although villagers aged between 18 and 40 were encouraged to be responsible for their own defence, there were many villages which did not take part in the program.

SYDNEY.—The national director of Australian Catholic Relief, Mr. Michael Whiteley, said yesterday, "Many Australian aid agencies have been critical of Indonesian actions in East Timor solely because they saw the unnecessary suffering they were causing to the Timorese people.

"We want to alleviate the suffering. It is our experience that the only sure way to do this is to embark on a long-term development program that will reestablish the agricultural sector and rebuild adequate medical facilities.

"I cannot understand why the Indonesian Government will not allow us to help. Our agencies are already involved in programs in Indonesia and there has been no government criticism of those programs".

Referring to an Indonesian statement that it was shipping rice to East Timor, Mr. Whiteley said this would not be necessary if a viable agriculture was developed. The cost of shipping this rice to Timor would mean that those most in need could not afford to buy it.

The chairman of the Australian Council for Overseas Aid, Mr. Richard Alston, wants the Indonesian Government to allow a delegation from Australian overseas-aid agencies to visit East Timor.

Mr. Alston, whose organisation is the coordinating body for 37 Australian voluntary agencies, said, "It seems that Indonesian authorities are determined to suppress the truth about the current situation in East Timor with the result that valuable humanitarian assistance will not be available to those reportedly in the greatest need".●

ELIMINATE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY POULTRY EXPORT SUBSIDIES

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today, as three top European Community officials—Agricultural Commission Paul Dalsager, International Affairs Commission Etienne Davignon, and External Affairs Commissioner Wilhelm Haferkamp—begin their 2 days of meetings with administration and congressional leaders, it is appropriate to review one very important issue that will be part of these meetings, namely, the European Community's use of unfair agricultural export subsidies.

A number of petitions have been filed with the U.S. Trade Representative under the provisions of section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 alleging unfair trade practices that injure U.S. producers. These petitions, involving poultry, wheat flour, citrus, pasta, and other products, charge that the European Community has used unfair export refunds to displace U.S. exports into third-country markets.

I am pleased the administration has accepted these cases for international investigation and has served notice that the United States will no longer tolerate unfair trading practices that adversely affect U.S. exports. It is long past time to serve such notice. The United States has been one of the most open markets in the world, and, as a consequence, we have seen our market shares at home and abroad eroded by foreign predatory practices.

In the poultry industry, for example, trade data support the argument that there has been a direct link between the European Community's poultry export subsidies and a reduction in the U.S. share of important foreign markets. Community export subsidies have disrupted U.S. poultry sales in non-EC Europe, the Middle East, the Far East, and the Caribbean. Until recently, the impact has been mainly on whole chickens, our principal poultry export. Now, however, there is concern about other segments of the poultry trade.

According to the data, subsidies enabled EC farmers to capture more than 93 percent of the combined U.S./EC share of the non-EC European market, leaving the United States in 1980 with only 6.5 percent of this market. The most drastic impact of Community export subsidies on the United States, however, has been in the Middle East, where, until 1966, we accounted for virtually all trade. After the introduction of the Community's subsidies, U.S. exports were severely curtailed. Furthermore, the Community's takeover of this market prevented the United States from benefiting in the threefold increase in the Middle East poultry market between 1975 and 1980. Of the combined U.S./EC exports to the Middle East in 1980, the U.S. share was only 18 percent, while that of the Community was 82 percent.

In the Far East—another growing market—the Community has been the main supplier only when the subsidy has been in effect. Community farmers' share of the combined U.S.-EC market in the Far East climbed from 36 percent in 1968 to 99 percent in 1974. When the subsidy was suspended in 1975, the EC share began to fall and, by 1979, had declined to less than 8 percent. In 1980, with the subsidy reactivated, EC exports increased 35 percent. This cannot just be coincidence.

While my own State of Delaware and the Delmarva poultry industry as a whole do not export, EC agricultural subsidies injure them by distorting markets and prices worldwide. We cannot stand idly by while our European Community trading partners use unfair practices to gain an inequitable share of the world market for poultry and other agricultural products. Should we be unable to redress the balance through present law, the United States may have to reconsider the means to achieve freer international trade and institute "reciprocity" as a guiding negotiating principle.

The Community is a powerful force in world food trade and a powerful friend and trading partner of the United States. It is in the EC's interest, as well as ours, that trade be conducted without government intervention or unfair benefits. I trust our visiting European leaders understand this.●

VOLUNTEERS

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I have long believed that volunteers have an important and a potentially decisive role to play in improving the quality of life in communities all over the country. Volunteers bring to community problems insights and concern, sometimes also expertise, of extraordinary significance.

In Colorado Springs, volunteers contributed more than 12,000 hours to assist the Colorado Springs Police Department. The interesting story of how these volunteers have helped the Colorado Springs area cope with rising crime rates and declining Federal financial resources is outlined in the following article from the FBI Law Enforcement Bulletin. I recommend it to the attention of all my colleagues.

The article follows:

VOLUNTARISM

A POLICE DEPARTMENT'S RESPONSE TO CHANGING TIMES

(By Maria B. Taylor)

The decade of the 80's, the most scientific and educated in recorded history, also looms as the most violent. Crime threatens to become our greatest public concern.

This concern is also coupled with increasing public pressure for lower taxes and improved productivity. Recent Federal budget cuts eliminating needed programs and resources have complicated the situation even further by gradually reducing capital resources to law enforcement agencies. Clearly, it is time for those in law enforcement to examine alternative resources.

The Colorado Springs Police Department (CSPD) started developing an alternative to both its own and the surrounding community's frustration over climbing crime rates and decreasing dollars when 8 years ago, the department's first volunteer program was introduced.

The motivation for using volunteers was not based on economic factors but on very human ones. Through exposure to daily police activity, the volunteer develops a realistic perspective of the law enforcement system and a resulting positive regard for the police agency and its personnel. Rather than internalizing all law enforcement problems, police agencies can share these problems with the community. The public relations impact and advocacy role developed through such citizen involvement is invaluable. The traditional communication gap between the police and the community begins to close.

The CSPD's volunteer program challenges other traditions. In the past, police volunteers throughout the Nation were usually reserve officers and posse members, emphasizing direct law enforcement assistance and field activity. The current law enforcement volunteer in Colorado Springs is of a new breed. The emerging portrait of this volunteer is that of a serious citizen advocate who provides the agency with a host of support services that extend and enrich the delivery system. It has been repeatedly shown in Colorado Springs that the volunteer is motivated out of genuine concern for an commitment to the law enforcement agency's purpose and function. As one volunteer succinctly explained, "We are all angry about crime, and this is one way we can positively channel our anger." In this decade of alarming crime rates, the realization is growing that law enforcement is no longer just the responsibility of the police officer but is a partnership between the public and private sectors.

This two-pronged realization that involvement fosters ownership and that personal contact increases awareness and understanding has given birth to what has become an expansive program in the CSPD, using a broad cross section of citizens in voluntary capacities. The 100 volunteers include all age, socioeconomic, racial/ethnic, religious and educational strata. Ages of volunteers range from 18 to 80, with the average age being 45. Fifty-one percent are male, 61 percent are employed, 25 percent are 55 or over, and some are handicapped and disabled. In 1980 alone, volunteers donated over 12,000 hours—equal to about $100,000 in services and over five full-time positions. Volunteers can be found in all four major bureaus of the department.

Overseeing the voluntary staffing of these units is a full-time paid volunteer services coordinator who serves an an advocate for both the law enforcement agency and the volunteer. He need not be employed in law enforcement but must be knowledgeable in human relations skills and volunteerism.

In managing these volunteers the coordinator/director uses the same fundamental skills and principles as personnel managers. Although unpaid, the volunteer is "hired," trained, integrated, evaluated, recognized, and even "fired" in a parallel process to paid department personnel. The result is the cultivation of professional volunteers in an established professional environment. Incorporation of an unpaid staff in this manner not only lends importance and significance to the volunteer's role but also from the staff perspective, lends credence to volunteer work and creates acceptance.

Since staff resistance to volunteers is the primary problem facing volunteer programs today, professionalism of a program is a valued goal. In the CSPD, the term "professional volunteer" is not contradictory. A close look at a few of the volunteers is perhaps the most illustrative method of documenting this point.

—The 80-year-old retired civil servant who assists running the extra-duty office by scheduling 80 officers per month and keeping a statistical log that documents and supports the need and increasing priority for extra-duty personnel to help alleviate an on-duty manpower shortage.

—The priest who loaned his expertise on "aging" to help develop, teach, and be a consultant to the Senior Victim Assistance Program, which was selected by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) as an exemplary project —The middle-aged housewife in transition from a confined domestic role provides needed clerical assistance to the department's business office, while developing valuable marketable skills.

—The nurse who deals with crime victims in distress and provides emotional and physical confort, followup, and referral.

—The 36-year-old criminal justice student who, while exploring a career shift, edits the weekly warrant information newsletter, which updates personnel in the patrol and investigative divisions on current fugitive information.

—The disabled volunteer who works in public relations by manning the substation police desk for case reporting and making public presentations on the subject of the policy department to community organizations.

—The volunteer who, in her third career, manages the office of the Organized Crime Strike Force, goes undercover to type confidential reports, and receives and records information from informants.

—The volunteer crime analyst who reviews approximately 250 criminal mischief cases per month and provides statistical data reflecting crime patterns, areas of concentrated activity, and M.O.'s. The information alerts the police officer to the possible relationship between criminal mischief crime patterns and other crime patterns in his sector.

This variety of examples indicates that volunteers, when well-matched with their personal goals, needs, and interests, can perform a voluntary job with professional quality. These examples also challenge the frequently encountered myth that "if the volunteer were competent, he/she would acquire a paying job." The success of the volunteer program in the Colorado Springs Police Department demonstrates that the primary motivator for work is the intrinsic value of work itself. Remuneration for the volunteer comes from the performance of challenging work, the satisfaction of achievement, increased responsibility, recognition for accomplishment, and personal growth and development through use of skills, talents, and creativity. For these reasons, volunteers are self-motivated and possess a personal commitment to the task at hand.

JOB DESIGN

The process of matching CSPD volunteers and duties begins with the development of a written job description that states the reason and specifications of recruitment. Frequently, organizations, in a frenzied attempt to supplement manpower shortages, will enlist volunteers with little or no knowledge of where or how they will be used. In "The Effective Management of Volunteer Programs," Marlene Wilson points out that recruiting before designing jobs is rather like trying to dance before music begins. The possibility of ending up out of step is very good.

A well-developed job description should include the title and objective of the position, major responsibilities, qualifications, time required, length of commitment, training provided, the supervisor or to whom the volunteer is accountable, and benefits (optional). The job description is drafted either by the requesting unit supervisor or jointly with the director of volunteers. The initial impression the potential volunteer develops about the agency is based primarily on the job description. When carefully and imaginatively written, a job description invites participation; when concretely and specifically developed, the description indicates the value of the position in context with the overall agency goals and objectives. It is the cornerstone of a well-managed volunteer program—the fundamental tool on which to recruit, motivate, and eventually evaluate.

RECRUITMENT

Recruitment naturally follows job design. It is a "selling" job and requires careful thought in targeting the audience and marketing the product—the job. This selective recruitment is preferable to general and widespread solicitation. A common mistake in recruiting is "looking in the wrong place for the right people."

The key to effective recruitment is marketing. It not only is necessary to sell the job to the volunteer but also provide and promote benefits—it is an exchange or barter system. Since the potential volunteer will not receive financial compensation, an effective marketing approach must be used to meet psychological needs and personal goals. Volunteers themselves can play a large part in the recruitment process. Satisfied volunteers sharing their experiences by word-of-mouth are a program's richest asset. Volunteers with specific professional skills can also provide technical savvy for recruitment activities. Presently, the CSPD draws from the expertise of a retired advertising executive, a commercial artist, and a graphics company. Clever and attractive publicity to establish the program's visibility and credibility in the community furnishes a sound base on which to begin recruiting.

An additional aspect that must not be overlooked is that recruitment is a highly individualized task, and therefore, needs to be tailored to the situation. There are many variables, such as the number of positions being filled, the type of job(s), the number of people needed for the job(s), and the types of skills required. An agency needs to be adequately equipped for a host of recruitment situations by maintaining a large "tool box" with a variety of "tools." According to the situation, a different tool may be selected and used, alone or in combination with other tools, to accomplish the task. Since recruitment strategies vary widely, pinpointing a successful formula is virtually impossible. The best recruitment tools, however, are a good sound volunteer program and meaningful jobs.

SCREENING, INTERVIEWING, AND PLACING

With the foundation laid in job design and recruitment, the screening, interviewing, and placement process becomes the next crucial step in volunteer program management. This selection process provides a built-in mechanism to determine appropriateness and suitability of the potential volunteer and to ensure quality control. For law enforcement agencies, most particularly, this is of paramount concern.

Ivan Scheier, Ph. D., noted consultant in the field of criminal justice volunteerism, states that we must "screen out those candidates clearly unsuited for certain jobs and redirect them to appropriate placements whenever possible." This is essential for several reasons:

(1) The agency must be protected. It must be helped, not hindered, by volunteer involvement;

(2) The agency's reputation is greatly affected by its volunteers;

(3) Morale of paid staff and other volunteers declines when inappropriate or poor volunteer placements occur; and

(4) The volunteer himself suffers when misplaced.

As important as screening out these "high risk" volunteers is the screening in of "high potential" candidates. Each potential volunteer has something to contribute—the volunteer director's task is to discover what that contribution is and put it to work effectively on behalf of the agency. This takes time and an ability to listen, probe, and "try on for size." If the interview process accomplishes its purpose, the candidate and agency will be able to make a fairly accurate assessment of mutual needs, expectations, and goals.

It follows, then, that the bottom line of the volunteer director's job is human resource development. One of the saddest mistakes made by volunteer administrators is not efficiently using a person's talents and abilities. Marlene Wilson points out that there are three concerns repeatedly expressed by volunteers:

(1) Their volunteer work will be a waste of time;

(2) Their skills and talents will not be used; and

(3) They may be placed in jobs for which they are not suited.

Effective interviewing and placing speaks to all these concerns, while ensuring that careful and deliberate steps have been taken to provide the most qualified person for the job.

The interview process should not end in the volunteer director's office but should proceed to the requesting unit supervisor and appropriate staff for final determination. To further ensure a successful placement, the selection process should include as many of the volunteer's potential coworkers as possible.

TRAINING

Training is a concept with which law enforcement personnel are very familiar. It has received increased emphasis and has enhanced the officers' and community's respect for law enforcement.

Training experiences for the volunteer also need to be provided. The volunteer appreciates and derives satisfaction from training programs that are relevant and provide skills and personal growth. Good training, therefore, is a primary motivator of volunteers, as well as a way to share information. It is a valuable tool to use in retaining volunteers and furnishing incentives.

Training is also believed to be a primary factor in limiting the number of on-the-job injuries. Since the inception of the CSPD volunteer program, there have been no job-related injuries; however, all persons involved in the program are covered by the city's medical insurance company.

Manpower and funding shortages have brought patrol functions to dangerously low levels, thus increasing the importance of the volunteer's role. Properly trained, a volunteer can release an officer to do what he/she is trained to do in handling high-priority calls for service and demanding, detailed investigative tasks.

Volunteer training, when effectively implemented, is conducted in three stages:

(1) Orientation—familiarizing the volunteer with the agency, its philosophy, functions, policies, organizational structure, and goals. This may include a tour, a briefing session (formal or informal), and arranged observation opportunities in areas of interest.

(2) Preservice training could include formal classroom instruction, required courses, suggested sessions of the police training academy, and/or informal on-the-job training by unit supervisor or appointee.

(3) Inservice training—volunteers need and want ongoing training and continuing educational opportunities. The more knowledgeable and informed they are, the more proficient they become in absorbing the routine work burdens generated by increasing population and criminal activity.

The value of training is best illustrated by the CSPD senior victim assistance team and the CSPD chaplaincy corps. The senior victim assistance team, a 15-member team that works with elderly victims of crime, undergoes a 3-month preservice training program in crisis intervention, communication skills, and familiarization with referral resources. Monthly meetings are held for case information exchange and discussion, in conjunction with specialized inservice training.

The chaplaincy corps, composed of 30 local clergy, accompany patrol officers on a rotating basis during peak evening hours 7 days a week. They are also on call 24 hours a day through a paging unit for counseling, consultation, and crisis work in the community and within the department itself. Their monthly training deals with topics ranging from police crisis intervention, department policies and procedures, legal matters, safety, psychological profiles on suicidals, battered women and substance abusers to pastoral skills development.

As well as receiving training, chaplains also train. In keeping with the chaplaincy program's purpose of professional sharing, chaplains provide training at the police academy to rookies on job-related and material problems and community referral resources.

A second dimension to training is staff training, a critical but often neglected element of a successful volunteer program. Considerable work needs to be done to develop a positive agency attitude that reflects the support of volunteers and enthusiasm for the program. Therefore, careful attention and continuous work is required to foster effective relationships between paid and volunteer staff.

Staff training also prevents potential problems by addressing topics such as resistance to volunteers; myths about volunteers; the philosophy of volunteer management, emphasizing a professional approach; supervision; evaluation and recognition of volunteers; and termination of volunteers. Failure to resolve barriers or to deal with issues, biases, and concerns can lead to poor and ineffective programs implementation, negative public relations as a result of a volunteer's unpleasant experiences, and eventual program rejection.

EVALUATION

Evaluation of both the volunteer's performance and the appropriateness of the placement assignment needs to be performed periodically. This review may be conducted formally at a prearranged time, working from the written job description, or informally and spontaneously according to the volunteer's needs and the cordinator's individual approach. Volunteers need to know on a regular basis how they are doing. Conversely, they need to communicate beliefs and suggestions that may contribute to the overall improvement of the program.

Likewise, the staff needs the feedback and support generated from the evaluation interview in order to respond appropriately. The volunteer services coordinator as a volunteer/agency liaison person should, with diplomacy and insight, furnish information and ideas that will enhance the volunteer's job satisfaction while increasing effectiveness and productivity for the agency.

The development of a volunteer program is too often viewed as a panacea to an agency's budgetary problems. Implementing a volunteer program, however, is not cost-free. While it is both cost-effective and cost-beneficial, there are built-in expenses, such as the coordinator/director's salary, office equipment and supplies, staff time spent in training and supervision, and volunteer recognition. These expenses are eventually counteracted by the program's final product. As with many human services, quantitative measurement and documented results of a volunteer program are difficult to pinpoint. Cost-saving elements in donated manhours, teamed with the number of officers freed for priority calls, provide some numerical clues. However, the breadth of the public relations dimension, the impact of citizen participation as a deterrent to crime, and the trust gained from a team relationship between police and citizens are benefits that cannot be purchased through any budgetary process. Clearly, the volunteer is a positive and revitalizing response to the increasing demands of law enforcement today. It is a resource that must be explored.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

EXPLAINING THE REAGAN REVOLUTION

HON. NEWT GINGRICH
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Doug Bandow, special assistant to the President, gave an inspiring speech to a gathering of college Republicans at Colgate University last November 13. I would like to share Mr. Bandow's explanation of the first year of the Reagan administration with my colleagues.

The speech follows:

KEYNOTE ADDRESS BY DOUG BANDOW

As College Republican activists, you all have a unique opportunity to affect the course of this nation, and the destiny of a generation of Americans to follow.

This opportunity may be more thankless than you think: John Quincy Adams once observed that "Posterity—you will never know how much it cost my generation to preserve your freedom. I hope you will make good use of it." But it is an opportunity, which, if spurned, may never return.

You may think this rhetoric to be overstated. I think not. We have reached a potential watershed in the development of this country. A number of different forces and policies have converged to reduce the average worker's real take-home pay and devalue his savings, increase unemployment, and destroy the positive expectations about the future that Americans have traditionally held.

It is the convergence of these factors which toppled a President and a party's control of the U.S. Senate. And it is the convergence of these factors which mandates a radical redirection of American policy. Only a dramatic change in direction, replacing reliance on bureaucratic dictates with encouragement of individual creativity, will overcome a half century of flawed policies.

Of course, the liberals and bureaucrats who have been in power for 50 years say that after 50 days we have failed. They want the American people once again to trust the same ideas that have failed, and failed, and failed. They think the people never learn.

Your responsibility within the Republican Party is perhaps the most crucial one of all: bringing a new message to the young people of America. Foremost in this new message is the revolution of ideas. As Ronald Reagan said in perhaps his most famous speech some 17 years ago:

"We have come to a time for choosing and we should recognize that two contrary philosophies divide us. Either we believe in our traditional system of individual freedom with constitutional limits on the power of government, or we abandon the American Revolution and confess that an intellectual elite in some far distant capitol can plan for us better than we can plan for ourselves."

The 1980's is now the decade of this choice—a choice between competing ideas. Indeed, ideas are what coalitions and politics are all about. As Emerson said, "The party of virility rules the hour, the party of ideas and sentiments rules the ages."

The ideas which will turn the Republican Party into the new, governing coalition are simple, but fundamental.

First, the highest political goal is freedom. There may be higher moral goals. Or social goals. Or personal goals. But the most important goal of government is to guarantee individual liberty.

This is the idea behind the founding of our country. In Ronald Reagan's words, this founding idea was "Very simply—you and I have God-given rights, among them freedom and the ability to determine our destiny. Government's only excuse for being is to see that no individual or group in our midst and no outside aggressor can take this freedom from us. Government is a watchdog, not a cow to be milked."

And, in the end, only the people can protect this freedom. As the late Judge Learned Hand said, "Liberty lies in the hearts of men and women. When it dies there, no constitution, no law, no court can save it." Your help is necessary to help ensure that this spirit of liberty lives on in the hearts of your fellow countrymen.

The second idea behind the Republican renaissance is that all wisdom in our society does not reside in Washington. Indeed, at times, wisdom exists in exactly inverse proportion to the proximity of the decisionmaker from the problem.

We believe that the most fundamental building blocks of our society are the individual, the family, and the community. Then local and state government. These are the organs in society which are best able to recognize and solve problems.

Thus, we reject the notion that just because some federal officials believe something is important, that it must be done. We repudiate the notion that federal bureaucrats have the answers to our problems, if only they can bypass "reactionary" property-owners, community groups, and mayors. Some things are not federal responsibilities. Period.

Third, there is no such thing as "government" money. Taxes don't grow in the Treasury. It is the people's money. And taking that money is taking money earned by Americans.

Since the role of government is not to beneficiently decide how much money each person should retain, social welfare programs result from the generosity of the taxpayers, and not from the right of the recipient. Therefore, the taxpayers rightfully demand that their money be well-spent, helping the truly needy, not the truly influential.

Our faith idea, a corollary of the third, is that income redistribution for the sake of redistribution is not a worthy goal in a free society. A compassionate society caring for those who cannot care for themselves is one thing. A covetous society taking from those who have earned it and giving to those who have not—and who do not need it—is quite another.

This opposition to subsidizing the lifestyles of those with political power applies with particular force to profit-making businesses and upper income individuals. Synfuels subsidies for large oil companies. Arts and humanities subsidies for the elite. Free Coast Guard inspections for yacht owners. Export subsidies for Boeing. These programs respond to greed, not principle.

Fifth, we believe that just because someone comes up with a "good" idea doesn't mean that the government should tax someone, spend money, and create a program. The role of government is not to fund "good" ideas; it is to establish the framework necessary for our free society.

Thus, flood insurance for people in areas which flood is a "good" idea. But why should the government provide it? Hospital care for merchant seamen is certainly good for the merchant seamen. But why should the tapayers pay for it? as I quoted Ronald Reagan earlier, "Government is a watchdog, not a cow to be milked."

The sixth idea is that, in Congressman Kemp's words, the people "should not waste their political talents and energies arguing over how to divide up the economic pie, but rather they should concentrate those talents and energies on making the pie grow."

Too many government policies, far from increasing the total economic benefits available to all, have sharply reduced those benefits. They have—on a wide scale—penalized achievement.

People do respond to incentives. Thus, higher tax rates—the portion of workers paying 25 cents or more out of each additional dollar they earn has more than quintupled in the last 15 years—create a major disincentive to work, investment, savings, and production. Quite simply, when you tax something, you get less of it. And we've been taxing work and savings.

People also respond to barriers. The minimum wage, for instance, is probably the greatest barrier to racial progress in America today. Economic study after economic study have found that the minimum wage destroys jobs—in particular those of the poor, the young, the ill-educated, and minorities.

In fact, by penalizing achievement in attempting to help a few, we have too often impoverished everyone else. Those individuals and regions of the country at the bottom of the economic ladder would gain little from even confiscating the wealth of everyone else. But they will gain a whole new world if we create and sustain a new era of growth and opportunity.

The seventh idea is that we should not hesitate to defend this country if it becomes necessary. Defense is the ultimate social good—indeed, it is the most fundamental duty of the federal government. Our defense should be strong, lean, and based on the other values which underly our society—indeed, which make our society worth defending. This includes a firm commitment to man our military forces through volunteers, the only method consistent with our historical tradition of freedom.

Finally, we believe that we should not be ashamed of the other seven ideas. We should be willing to spread these ideas not only here at home, but also around the globe. Indeed, our ideas are our real weapons abroad. As James Reston has noted, "It is not the penetration of Western military power that Moscow has to fear, but the penetration of freedom and faith."

Thus, for the first time in four years we have men and women representing the U.S. who understand the power of ideas. Americans can now be confident that no longer will we abandon America's ideals, kowtowing to foreign hypocrisies, Soviet lies, and third-world demands for tribute. No longer will we remain on the defensive.

We will remind the world that societies without the right to own property cannot feed themselves. And that societies without the freedom of expression stagnate.

We will also remind the world that societies which build walls, mine borders, hire guards, and shoot children to keep their people in are societies that are fearful of ideas. Governments which incarcerate, brainwash, torture, and murder their people are terrified of ideas.

And we will point out that they are societies which will—sooner, like Poland, or later, like the Soviet Union—fall to ideas.

These are the ideas which you must use to help unify this country, to renew its spirit, and to recreate its sense of purpose. It is particularly up to you to spread these values to the many young Americans who are just emerging in our community of shared values.

Indeed, the most fundamental message which I hope you will take back with you to your colleges and communities is a positive one: that we as a nation are making a new beginning. It is a new beginning that we all must share in.

Our new beginning recognizes that we can solve our problems. This Administration may not be able to remedy 50 years of neglect and error in 50, or 500 days. But it, and its successors, will remedy those errors.

In contrast, the Democrats spent the last four years telling us how we no longer could solve our problems. The problems were too complex. They were caused by OPEC. They were caused by the greed of the American people. They were caused by Americans spending too much. They were caused by taxes being too low. Or we simply couldn't understand what they were caused by. But the most important thing is that they were caused by someone—anyone—else.

They then went on to tell us that maybe, just maybe, if we were very lucky, we could muddle through the next few years. Of course, everyone would have to pay more taxes. And wait in line for gas. And spend less. And accept a lower standard of living. And live through a future of sacrifice and despair.

We, as President Reagan said when he accepted the Republican nomination for President, "utterly reject this view. The American people, the most generous on earth, who created the highest standard of living, are not going to accept the notion that we can only make a better world for others by moving backwards ourselves. Those who believe we can have no business leading the nation."

I am happy to be able to bring you the good news that this Administration has made a dramatic—and successful—start on our new beginning, where, in President Reagan's words, trust is placed "not in one person or one party, but in those values that transcend persons and parties."

For example, we are starting to restore the American spirit of voluntary service and cooperation, of individual and community initiative. The President has set as a national priority the removal of government roadblocks to voluntary service, and has frequently reminded Americans of their traditional commitment to help their fellow citizens.

We have also started—and I emphasize the word "started"—to slow the growth of government. After 50 years of constant growth, the federal behemoth has momentum all of its own. And its going to take some time to stop it.

This Administration has begun the process of transferring back to the states and localities those programs which are their traditional responsibilities. The 1981 Budget reconciliation Act created nine block grants, consolidating a host of categorical programs, and eliminating hundreds of regulations.

The President decontroled oil prices on January 27, 1981. Doing so freed American producers and consumers from a confining web of regulations that actually subsidized foreign imports, inhibited marketing innovations, and discouraged domestic exploration and production.

The result is that the free market has worked almost precisely as expected. Prices now stand at roughly four cents more per gallon than they did before decontrol; the Administration had predicted three to five cents. In fact, in inflation-adjusted dollars, prices now are actually lower!

You might also be interested to know that by unleashing the forces of competition, deregulation has actually put downward pressure on oil profits. The profits of a number of companies have declined since decontrol. I want to add that this doesn't disturb us, since our commitment is to freedom and competition, not assured profits.

America now has a firm and consistent foreign and defense policy, reflecting our belief that the ultimate social good is the defense of this country and its values.

Finally, we have a President and Administration which is proud, rather than ashamed, of America's values. It promotes American capitalism as a model for economic development for the rest of the world. Whether it be at Cancun, in the Conference on the Law of the Sea, or in the various other United Nations organizations, the U.S. is firmly rejecting the so-called New International Economic Order, which is, in reality, just the same old call for income redistribution and handouts.

Instead, America is telling the lesser-developed countries of the world that the record shows which economic system works. It is telling them that they can no longer expect the U.S. to bail them out of the failures of their systems. And it is doing so in a manner that the whole world can hear.

Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty are also being revamped to make them live up to their names. We, and they, know the accuracy of the Bible verity: "You shall know the Truth and the Truth shall make you free."

Indeed, if you don't believe that the President has been starting to carry out his promises, just read yesterday's editorial in the Washington Post:

"The administration, however, must take credit for the pervasive fear now disrupting the work of many agencies. Federal workers have grown used to the anti-bureaucracy speeches that have become a fixture of presidential campaigns over the past decade or so. This, however, is the first administration that has backed up its verbal assaults with real action."

I couldn't have put it better myself.

Now your task—I don't think I have to say should you decide to accept it, since you're already here—is to spread news of these accomplishments to your fellow Americans, and to help elect more Republicans who will help build upon these accomplishments at the national level, and spread them to the state and local levels.

In doing so, be willing to admit that we've only just begun, and that everything has not worked out as well as we'd like. Inflation, and interest rates, though falling, are still too high. Unemployment is far too high. But were it not for the tax and budget cuts which are now in place, the hopes for a quick recovery from the recession would be bleak. Instead, because of the groundwork we've laid, the future is bright.

I wish you a very successful weekend here, because I believe it will help prepare you for the leadership of a party, a philosophy, and a country in the years ahead. It will help you embody the real spirit of America.

Indeed, this is what it is all about: the American spirit. It involves a rededication to the spirit, which, in Ronald Reagan's words, "knows no ethnic, religious, social, political, regional or economic boundaries; the spirit that burned with zeal in the hearts of millions of immigrants from every corner of the earth who came here in search of freedom."

This Administration, and the Republicans in Congress, are taking the lead in forging a new coalition, and implementing new policies. Most important, we are working with the American people in developing new ideas.

You, through schools like this one, and your activism, are also leading. And the values, beliefs, and ideas which you embody and share will be the ones that will be guiding our nation in the coming generations.●

HOW MUCH FOR SCIENCE?

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, as we look forward to hearing further from the President and his administration on the details of the new budget, concern is being raised once again over a number of programs that are key to the long-term economic health of the Nation. In a recent editorial published in the February 2, 1982. Washington Post, particular focus on science and science education was made. The editorial makes a number of good points:

American scientific preeminence is threatened, threatening our security and economic health.

Secondary education requirements and achievements in science and mathematics have sharply declined, reducing the quality and quantity of future candidates for technical and scientific careers.

Graduate education in engineering and science is severely threatened, adversely affecting our production of new technical educators.

Basic research support faces severe cuts as nations like Japan and West Germany increase theirs to provide

We should be looking to not only protecting, but in some fields increasing our basic research support.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the editorial is well worth considering at this point, and I recommend it to my colleagues.

HOW MUCH FOR SCIENCE?

As the annual struggle over the federal budget gets under way, it is worth pondering what will happen to money for science. American science and technology are still the best in the world. But there are enough signs of strain to suggest that our accustomed preeminence—on which a large part of U.S. security and economic power depends—is fragile, even endangered.

The trouble starts with education. For more than a decade, secondary school curriculum requirements and achievements have fallen sharply in science and mathematics, while an opposite trend has been present in most other developed countries. The result is already evident. A NASA official reported recently, for example, that the space agency's cost overruns come in part from delays that are, in turn, the result of a lack of technically skilled workers.

Federal support for graduate education is in doubt for the first time in 30 years. In many fields, engineers are in short supply, but engineering schools cannot take in more students because they cannot find trained faculty to teach them. Shortage of faculty means heavier teaching loads and therefore less research. Schools do not have enough money to pay more professors even if these could be found, nor can they replace badly obsolete laboratories. Troubles that now afflict engineering are beginning to be seen in the sciences as well.

Money for basic research in this country has been essentially constant for 10 years. To the extent that scientific advance is linked to money—there is a close, but not rigid relationship—that means a decade without real growth. Meanwhile increases in research funds in Japan, West Germany, France and elsewhere have paid off with growth in both scientific and industrial productivity. And now federal research budgets face severe cuts.

Basic research, a long-range investment for the benefit of all of society, is properly and necessarily the responsibility of the federal government. Industry can be asked to expand its support of applied research and of development projects, but it is not industry's role, nor is the industrial setting the best environment for basic research. Yet less than 15 percent of federal research and development funds currently goes to basic research. Too much federal money supports development projects that are the proper province of industry. Allen Bromley, president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, recently made the valuable suggestion that the ubiquitous but misleading term "R&D" be dropped, in order to separate the financing of these two very different activities.

If serious damage is to be avoided as the federal budget is cut, Congress and the administration should not only protect, but in some fields increase, basic research funds. Ways should also be explored to assure more continuity in the amount of support such research is given. It takes nine years to produce a PhD scientist, and years to assemble a research team and carry a project to fruition. When the money disappears for a few years, the people disappear too, and can seldom be brought back. Abrupt changes like those that took place during last year's budget cycle can therefore wipe out years of past investment and future productivity.●

TRIBUTE TO RICHARD BOLLING

HON. PHILLIP BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to a major figure in the House, Representative RICHARD BOLLING. DICK is departing the House and will leave behind a legacy equaled by few in the history of this body.

When DICK and I have been on opposite sides of an issue he has been one of my most formidable opponents; when we have worked the same side of a fight, our side has usually prevailed. I will sorely miss him—and the Nation will miss him at a time when the forces of reactionary politics hold sway in Government. DICK has stood firm against Ronald Reagan and his allies in Congress.

Hundreds of men and women have come and gone as Members of the House of Representatives. Some have left little trace; others left to seek other elective office—at times, mistakenly referred to as "higher office". I save my deepest admiration for those, as DICK BOLLING, who develop an abiding love and respect for this institution. DICK's career will stand as a monument to all who serve here. If they learn from his dedication to the institution, this House will continue its long tradition as a great legislative body.●

CHERYL MILLER—SCHOOLGIRL REACHING NEW HEIGHTS

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I extend my congratulations to Cheryl Miller, a student at Poly High School, Riverside, Calif. Cheryl has become a superstar because of her fantastic skills on the basketball court.

Cheryl was voted the best girl basketball player in the country: Parade magazine All America team member for 3 years, California Interscholastic Federation Class 4A Player of the Year, and the 1981 Dial Female Athlete of the Year. Poly's girls' basketball team is the best in the State, and some say maybe the country.

College recruiters for schools around the country are pursuing Cheryl, a 32.8-point-average-per-game scorer, and she is considered the Kareem Abdul-Jabbar of women's basketball. Cheryl, who is 6 feet 2 inches tall, is still growing, according to her father. Last week she scored an alltime high of 105 points, a California school record for girls, in Riverside Poly's 70th consecutive victory, a streak that dates to December 1979 when she was a sophomore.

In an extensive interview with the New York Times' sports editor, Gordon S. White, Jr., he reports that Cheryl has not decided upon what college to attend. She is still looking around, and the 1984 Olympics are her biggest goal right now, unless another women's professional basketball league is formed before she graduates from college.

Cheryl aspires to go into communications—primary focus on telecasting. She is the third of five children of Saul, Sr. and Carrie Miller and one of three gifted athletes among them. Her brother Darrell, 22, is a catcher in the California Angels' farm system. Reggie, 15 is a 6 feet 5 inch junior guard on the Riverside Poly boys' team. Tamie, her 13-year-old sister, is showing signs of making volleyball her sport, and Saul, Jr., the oldest at 27, is in the Air Force.

SCHOOLGIRL IS REACHING HEIGHTS

(By Gordon S. White, Jr.)

"You know what Lew Alcindor did for men's basketball? Well, that's what Cheryl Miller is going to do for women's basketball."

That prophecy came from Judy Holland, the former women's basketball coach at U.C.L.A. and now the school's women's athletic director.

College recruiters for schools around the country are pursuing Miss Miller, an 18-year-old senior at Riverside (Calif.) Poly High School, as persistently as they did Alcindor, now known as Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, when he was a senior at Power Memorial High School in Manhattan in 1965.

Miss Miller, who is 6 feet 2 inches tall and still growing, according to her father, increased the recruiters' interest last week when she scored 105 points, a California school record for girls, in Riverside Poly's 70th consecutive victory, a streak that dates to December 1979, when she was a sophomore. It looked like the perfect game for the record, since the opponent, Norte Vista High, had not won a game in three years. Poly won by 179-15. A girls' high school game is 32 minutes long.

COACH TAKES RESPONSIBILITY

But Miss Miller's coach, Floyd Evans, said, "A lot of people forget about the 30-second clock in women's high school basketball. You have to shoot or give up the ball. Going in, we did feel she had a chance to break her own record of 77 set last year against the same team, and I was going to take her out if she got 78. But she did it so early in the final quarter I just let her stay in and go for 100. I am responsible.

"The other night she came down on the break on one side of the free-throw line. We had another girl going in low, and Cheryl wanted to pass off to her for the score. But another girl came in between them as Cheryl was jumping up to pass down low. So she flipped the ball up to the backboard, instead, banking it off to the left, and just kept flying on to tip the rebound back into the basket."

That play included one of only four missed shots, and one of her 46 field goals, in her 105-point performance.

In the 90 games she has played for the school since her freshman year, she has scored 3,026 points, for a 32.8 average per game. She has made 1,105 of 1,621 field-goal attempts and 286 of 422 free throws. She also has 1,353 rebounds and 368 assists.

"Players like Anne Meyers and Lucy Harris were great players," Miss Holland said. "But they did not dominate the game. This kid is going to dominate the game. She plays above the rim. Our coach, Billie Moore, said that. She said everyone else plays below the rim while Cheryl plays above the rim."

Miss Miller said she had not decided upon a college. "I'm looking to everybody right now and looking at the academics I will take," she said. "The 1984 Olympics are my biggest goal right now, and unless another women's professional basketball league is formed before I graduate from college my basketball career may end when I graduate from college. I want to go into communications, telecasting, I guess."

She is the third of five children of Saul Sr. and Carrie Miller and one of three gifted athletes among them. Darrell, 22, is a catcher in the California Angels' farm system. Reggie, 15, is a 6-5 junior guard on the Riverside Poly boys' team. "He will be the most sought-after athlete in this area next year by college recruiters," Evans said.

Tamie, the 13-year-old sister, is showing signs of making volleyball her sport, and Saul Jr., the oldest at 27, is in the Air Force.

Her father has set ground rules for the recruiters.

"First, they go to the coach and he will give them the phone number," Mr. Miller said, "I write back to everybody who writes to us. Then we allow them to call her and speak directly to her as long as it is within reason.

"Up to now, everything has been within reason, but I look for things to heat up for the next three weeks."

FANS WORSHIP CHERYL MILLER

(By Donna Kennedy)

They were all there: rude fans, cutesy-pie pompon girls, gruff-talking coaches, college scouts, video cameras and kids clamoring for autographs.

And this was a Thursday night girls basketball game.

Empty bleachers of yesteryear have disappeared along with amateurish ball-handling, at least at Poly High School in Riverside.

Poly's girls' basketball team is the best in the state, some say the country, and North isn't far behind.

And of course, there's Cheryl Miller. Poly's Super Star, the best girl basketball player in the country. (Parade magazine All-America team member for three years. California Interscholastic Federation Class 4A Player of the Year and 1981 Dial Female Athlete of the Year.)

Good basketball, that's what the 800-some spectators came to see at Poly High School Thursday night.

With the youngsters, there was a bit a hero worship.

The girls' basketball team from Alcott Elementary School was enthralled. They planned their pre-game strategy. Eleven-year-old Kathy Franklin wanted the Alcott Alley Cats to yell in unison: "Che-ryll! Cheryll!" when Cheryl Miller was introduced. Her friend Alvina Darby, 10, was just as set on "Mil-ler! Mil-ler!"

When Miller ran out on the court, the girls forgot their plan and settled for all-out jumping and screaming.

This is their team and their star. After all, the Alcott Alley Cats might just grow up to be Poly Bears.

Meanwhile, the pompon girls and flag twirlers kept up a steady chant.

The Bears have set the pace
They'll crack your face
Gonna pick you up, turn you 'round
Gonna drive you right into the ground.

They even did some choreographed routines.

The Poly boys' basketball team was playing rival Huskies across town at North High School. "We have to divide ourselves up between the girls' and the boys' games," explained Kris Kjos. While the pompon girls and flag twirlers were cheering the girls at Poly, the varsity, junior varsity and freshman cheerleading squads were cheering the boys at North. Poly won there too, 68-64.

The goals this year was to support all sports, the girls explained. "Even without an audience," said Maria Brandon.

That's their usual mode of operation. "We have a schedule," explained Sheryl "Sheryl with an S" Miller. She's careful about the spelling. Sometimes the attendance office confuses the "almost 5-foot" tall pompon girl with 6-foot-2 basketball star, but only on paper. Of course, people can't resist asking Sheryl Miller whether she plays basketball. She doesn't.

As in all frenzied cheering sections, there was some inspired booing and jeering:

"Hey, ref, What's your problem?"

"C'mon ref, you're missing a good game."

"Hey, ref, get in the game, you idiot."

Besides defending her verbally from "bad calls," fans take an even more personal interest in Miller.

"Why doesn't she pull up her socks?" came a woman's voice high in the bleachers.

"Good try," came a young voice as Miller shot across the floor on her belly.

Fifteen-year-old Kristine Lawrence, a friend from Arlington First Baptist Church, even keeps a scrapbook of Miller's achievements.

Thursday's game was closer than most of the Poly landslides recorded in Lawrence's book. North scored first, and even Miller had to fight for her 26 points.

The game ended at 69-58, Poly's 67th consecutive win.

Miller was immediately engulfed by autograph seekers, most of them elementary- and middle-school-age girls.

Kathy Franklin was especially pleased.

IN REMEMBRANCE OF MR. W. A. (BILLY) CAROTHERS

HON. SAM B. HALL, JR.

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, a distinguished constituent of the First Congressional District of Texas, Mr. W. A. (Billy) Carothers, of Sulphur Springs, Tex., passed away recently. Because of his great community leadership and total devotion to the welfare of others, it is appropriate to commend him in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Bill Carothers truly fit the description in the old east Texas saying about "a man who never met a stranger." He made friends all over Texas and the Nation. His loss to his community will be felt by us all.

During his lifetime he gave selflessly in many civic endeavors. Serving as a deacon and elder of the First Presbyterian Church, as a member and president of the Sulphur Springs School Board, and being active throughout the area in the Rotary Club were just part of his efforts.

Billy leaves a wonderful wife of many years, the former Ina Maye Ashcroft, who has herself meant much to the people of her church and community over the years. She and his three children and grandchildren will miss him in a more intimate way, but all of us have lost a friend.

The following article, which appeared in the January 22, 1982, edition of the Sulphur Springs News-Telegram, is included as a part of my remarks:

DEATH CLAIMS CIVIC LEADER

W. A. (Billy) Carothers, 75, 415 Church St., died at 10:50 a.m. Thursday in Memorial Hospital after a brief illness.

He was one of Hopkins County's most widely known and respected civic and business leaders.

He was associated with members of his family in Carothers Bros. clothing store, established by his father and uncle in 1907, for many years until his retirement.

He had many civic interests. He served as a member and president of the Sulphur Springs School Board. He was a past president of the Sulphur Springs Junior Chamber of Commerce and of the Hopkins County Chamber of Commerce. He also had served as president of the Sulphur Springs Rotary Club and held the record for attendance.

He had served as the chairman of the United Fund. He had served as a deacon and as an elder in First Presbyterian Church.

He was a charter member of Sulphur Springs Country Club and an avid golfer for many years.

Mr. Carothers attended Texas A&M University and was an active alumni.

He was born William Andrew Carothers Sept. 14, 1906 in Blanket, Texas, the son of L. J. and Zuma DeBord Carothers.

He was married to the former Ina Maye Ashcroft on Jan. 21, 1933. She survives.

Other survivors include a son, William Andrew Carothers Jr. of Washington, D.C.; two daughters, Carol Flegal of Bernardsville, N.J. and Lucy McRae of Dallas; a sister, Mrs. S. Byrd Longino of Sulphur Springs; six grandchildren, four nephews and two nieces.

Funeral services will be conducted at 2 p.m. Saturday in First Presbyterian Church, with Dr. Clem Sorley, pastor, officiating.

Burial will follow in City Cemetery, with E. L. Ashcroft III, W. T. Allison II, Dr.

Joseph B. Longino, Bill Bruce, Gerald Prim, Tom Inglis, Homer Stewart, Weber Fouts, Mayo Vick, Jack Gibson, David Alexander, Leon Leggett and Leeman Teetes serving as pallbearers.

Honorary pallbearers will be the deacons and elders of the First Presbyterian Church.

Memorials may be made to the Building Fund of First Presbyterian Church.

Tapp Funeral Home is in charge of arrangements.●

TRIBUTE TO FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, as we commemorate the 100th anniversary of Franklin Delano Roosevelt's birth, I would also like to pay tribute to one of the great men in American history.

When F. D. R. became President, the Nation was confronted by the most severe economic crisis in our history. Banks were closed, nearly 13 million people were out of work, many industries had virtually ceased to operate and the agricultural economy had hit an alltime low.

While he called his program the New Deal, it was not so much a fully prepared, comprehensive strategy. Rather, as we now know, the New Deal consisted of a willingness to try innovations, a broad faith in the American spirit, the eagerness to act and his own boundless energy. With the force of his personality he inspired the American people and, above all, gave us hope when we needed it most, not only during the Depression but in the dark days of World War II. Those close to F. D. R. have described him as an inexhaustible source of energy.

He truly changed the face of Government. He built Government up in an effort to right the economy and put millions of persons back to work. F. D. R. felt that if the Government had a responsibility to protect its citizens it also had the responsibility to do all in its collective power to assist them. He made the Federal Government responsible for the unemployed, he kept homes and farms from being foreclosed, he regulated the stock markets and guaranteed bank deposits.

With the Depression and the Second World War, he faced the greatest threats to the United States since the Civil War. And like President Lincoln, he met the challenge before him.

F. D. R. was a friend of decency, justice, and freedom. He gave the average American citizen new hope, an achievement that seemed impossible at the time. His impression on our Nation continues to this day. His personal impression on the people also continues. A picture of F. D. R. still hangs on the wall in many union halls, ethnic clubs and private homes in my congressional district.

He restored the people's faith in themselves, and earned the respect, admiration and love of our great country.●

STATES PUSH FOR BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that on the day the President's budget message is formally transmitted to Congress, the Washington Post carries a story on page 2, "Missouri Lawmakers Push Constitutional Convention."

The administration's budget recommendations contain deficit projections of $98.6 billion for the current fiscal year, $91.5 billion for fiscal year 1983, $82.9 billion for fiscal year 1984 and $71.9 billion for fiscal year 1985. While we can take minor comfort from the declining trend of the projections, the absolute level of projected deficits is simply unacceptable. We must balance the budget.

The several States of the Union are coming to the same conclusion about the consequences of deficit spending and the need for a constitutional amendment to mandate a balanced budget and limited taxes. This morning's Post story details the emerging efforts in Missouri to have the legislature adopt a resolution calling for a constitutional convention to consider a balanced budget amendment. If Missouri acts favorably, 32 States will have called for a convention for the purpose of fashioning a balanced budget amendment. Alaska became the 31st State on January 18, 1982.

Article V of the Constitution reads in part:

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution.

Under article V, 34 States are required to call a convention. With Missouri on the verge of perhaps becoming the 32d State, it is the duty of Congress to heed the concerns of the States and take two steps in the course of this year. First, we must submit a constitutional amendment to the States for ratification as soon as possible. Second, we must adopt a budget resolution for 1983 and the out years that puts us on a credible course toward a balanced budget in 1983.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to insert two items in the RECORD. The first item is this morning's Post story. The second is a list of the States that have called for a Constitutional Convention on a balanced budget together with the status of the issue in other States.

MISSOURI LAWMAKERS PUSH CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

(By Claudia Kuehl)

JEFFERSON CITY, MO.—In 1789, as the nation's best and brightest pondered the intricacies of a national Constitution, Thomas Jefferson proposed placing a limit on the federal government's ability to go into debt.

But the concept of spending no more than you have appeared so self-evident, so imminently rational, that the forefathers omitted it from the Constitution. Almost 200 years later, the U.S. government is more than $1 trillion in debt.

Lawmakers here are seeking to correct the forefathers' omission by making Missouri the 32nd state to call for a constitutional convention to approve an amendment mandating a balanced federal budget.

The approval of 34 states is needed, but Missouri supporters think 32 will be enough to convince Congress that a convention is inevitable. The supporters reason that to avert a constitutional convention—which, once in session, can tinker with just about anything in the Constitution—federal lawmakers will scamper to approve a balanced-budget amendment and submit it to the states for ratification.

Missouri, a state undergoing a cash-flow crisis so severe that state income tax refunds are being delayed, has been hurt by the inflationary effects of the deficit, particularly high interest rates.

Many legislators from both parties say they have lost faith in the ability or willingness of President Reagan and the Congress to take corrective measures. They note that the president, who vowed as a candidate to balance the budget, now says the debt will grow by another $100 billion this year.

"If we don't do something there's not going to be a [federal] government at all," said Sen. Phillip Snowden, a Kansas City Democrat who will introduce a balanced budget resolution this week in the Senate. "Now it [the deficit] is over $100 billion, next year a projected $160 billion. It's just crazy."

Several previous attempts to approve balanced budget resolutions sailed through the Senate but died in the House at the hands of those who say they support a balanced budget but hear a constitutional convention might bring a wholesale onslaught on basic freedoms, or at the very least fragment the country over sensitive issues such as abortion or equal rights.

To avoid that problem, the Missouri resolution contains a caveat: If the convention is not limited to the balanced budget issue only, Missouri withdraws its support.

But the caveat hasn't converted everyone. While conceding that opposing a balanced federal budget is "like being against motherhood," Rep. Elmer (Lucky) Cantrell, a Democrat from St. Louis County and a voice for labor in the House, said he can't support any measure that includes a call for a convention.

And Lt. Gov. Kenneth Rothman agrees: "This is no time to take the ship of state into uncharted waters."

BALANCED BUDGET ACTION BY THE STATES

Thirty-one of the necessary thirty-four States have adopted resolutions calling for a Constitutional convention:

Alabama	Nevada
Alaska	New Hampshire
Arizona	New Mexico
Arkansas	North Carolina
Colorado	North Dakota
Delaware	Oklahoma
Florida	Oregon
Georgia	Pennsylvania
Idaho	South Carolina
Iowa	Tennessee
Kansas	Texas
Louisiana	Utah
Maryland	Virginia
Mississippi	Wyoming
Nebraska

An additional nine States have had one house of their legislature adopt a resolution calling for a Constitutional convention:

California	Ohio
Hawaii	Rhode Island
Kentucky	Washington
Missouri	West Virginia
Montana

Four States have called upon Congress to submit a Constitutional amendment on a balanced budget to the States for ratification:

California	Montana
Illinois	Kentucky●

DEPORTED TO SALVADOR

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am including in today's RECORD an alarming article by Mr. Frank Kiehne which recently appeared in the New York Times concerning the deplorable U.S. policy of deporting Salvadoran refugees back to their war-torn nation. Mr. Kiehne is the interim director of Church World Service's immigration and refugee program in New York City.

I was outraged to learn from Mr. Kiehne's article that nearly 1,000 Salvadorans each month are being sent back to their homeland, where they will most certainly be subjugated to the brutal human rights abuses of the Salvadoran Government and its out-of-control military forces. This policy flatly contradicts both the United Nation's 1967 Protocol Related to the Status of Refugees, and our own Refugee Act of 1980 which seek to prevent refugees from being returned against their will to a territory where they face persecution.

Just as repugnant is the reported treatment which these refugees receive while being detained in the United States. According to Mr. Kiehne, lawyers and others engaged in refugee assistance projects in INS detention facilities report that Salvadorans are sometimes brutally treated: Families have been separated, young children are placed in solitary confinement, and Salvadorans are coerced to "voluntarily" return to their country.

What is our country coming to, when we so flagrantly contradict the humanitarian traditions and principles for which we stand? Perhaps the answer is in Mr. Kiehne's analysis of this situation:

Clearly there is a direct relationship between our Government's unwillingness to recognize these Salvadorans as refugees and its official policy of support for the military-dominated junta running El Salvador. Indeed, to recognize escaping Salvadorans as bona fide refugees would be to tacitly admit that the regime is not able to maintain order and guarantee the safety of its citizens.

I commend this important article to the attention of my colleagues:

DEPORTED TO SALVADOR

(By Frank C. Kiehne)

For many people in the United States, the violence in El Salvador is a nasty business that we would just as soon forget. Yet thousands of Salvadoran refugees who cannot forget are making their way across the border into the United States only to be told that they are not welcome here.

Their nightmare does not end when they arrive in this country—a land that has prided itself on being a haven for many oppressed peoples. Almost every day, planes carrying refugees destined for San Salvador depart from Los Angeles and from southern Texas.

Recent figures from the Immigration and Naturalization Service indicate that every month nearly 1,000 Salvadorans are being sent back to their war-torn homeland. Because of conditions in El Salvador, little concrete information is available about the fate of many of those returned. However, numerous well-documented reports tell of torture and executions of some returnees.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service, acting on a State Department recommendation, treats Salvadorans not as "refugees" but as "illegal aliens," and thus considers them deportable.

This return of Salvadoran refugees to their homeland by our Government despite their well-founded fear of persecution flatly contradicts both the United Nation's 1967 Protocol Related to the Status of Refugees, which the United States has signed, and our own Refugee Act of 1980. Both affirm that no nation shall expel or return a refugee, against his will, to a territory where he fears persecution.

Some of those being returned are legally deported, but a larger number, officials insist, return "voluntarily," having signed Immigration and Naturalization Service "voluntary return" agreements.

Lawyers and other people engaged in church-supported refugee-aid projects in Immigration and Naturalization Service detention facilities report that Salvadorans are sometimes brutally treated. We have been told that families have been separated and that young children have been placed in solitary confinement.

Salvadorans under detention reportedly were told that their only choice was to return "voluntarily" or be deported. Some who ask to apply for political asylum are told that they may remain in detention for many months while their application is processed and considered. There are also reports of Salvadorans being literally dragged to planes even after filing formal claims for political asylum through lawyers.

Clearly there is a direct relationship between our Government's unwillingness to recognize these Salvadorans as refugees and its official policy of support for the military-dominated junta running El Salvador. Indeed, to recognize escaping Salvadorans as bona fide refugees would be to tacitly admit that the regime is not able to maintain order and guarantee the safety of its citizens.

Why are these thousands being sent back, and why is the public not hearing much about it? We believe that it is mainly because our Government wants to continue to downplay its complicity with and contribution to the warfare being waged in Central America.

Salvadorans who have arrived recently in the United States have been telling stories of terror. So have the news media. Many people in this country are beginning to realize that beyond official United States Government "facts" and pronouncements about El Salvador, it is not merely statistics that are getting shot and bayoneted down there but actual human beings, who bleed when bullets puncture their skin.

The silence surrounding the return of these refugees is beginning to be broken, partly because of the work of churches and other organizations that are raising their voices in protest.

Local church projects such as El Rescate ("The Rescue") in Los Angeles, and organizations like the Border Association for Refugees from Central America, in the Rio Grande Valley in Texas, with minimal funds have been engaging in efforts to stop deportations of Salvadorans apprehended by Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Nationally, religious organizations such as Church World Service of the National Council of Churches and the U.S. Catholic Conference, and many other groups, are calling on our Government to stop returning Salvadorans, and to stop supporting the regime responsible for their becoming refugees.

The voices of others are needed to end the virtual silence on this crime against humanity and to allow the cry of pain to emerge, to be heard at last.●

STUDENTS LOSE SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

HON. SHIRLEY CHISHOLM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, according to a January 22, New York Times article, budget cuts made last summer in the social security program are now placing 800,000 students in danger of losing educational payments. Presently social security child recipients collect benefits through age 18, and full-time college students receive benefits through age 22. May 1, 1982, students not currently enrolled in college will no longer receive extended benefits. Over a 4-year period this program will be phased out completely, reducing benefits 25 percent annually. Their options severely limited, many students are looking to high school counselors in hopes that they may enter college early, before the May deadline. University officials express concern, however, that students who exercise this option will be unable to adjust to college life. For students who are scholastically and academically well rounded, early entrance will not be a problem, but those who are either too young or unable to meet academic requirements must look elsewhere to fund their college education. I am enclosing this news article for review by my colleagues. It certainly demonstrates the unfair burden placed on some 800,000 students as a result of the budget-cutting mania in the last session.

AID LOSS SPURS EARLY RUSH TO COLLEGE

(By David Bird)

Next Monday Theresa White, a 16-year-old student at John Dewey High School in Brooklyn, will be starting as a freshman at Wagner College on Staten Island instead of finishing her junior year of high school.

Theresa is one of thousands of high school students who will suddenly become college students to keep from losing the Social Security benefits they have been counting on to help get them through higher education.

The rush to college is a result of last summer's budget trimming, which will eventually end completely the education payments that have been going to children of people insured under Social Security who have died or become disabled.

In most cases it is only high school seniors who are getting into college early, but there are also 16-year-old juniors like Theresa who are going directly to college campuses.

PAYMENTS TILL AGE 22

Before the budget cuts, a child entitled to Social Security payments would be able to collect monthly payments until age 22, four years past the normal cutoff age of 18, while pursuing a full-time college course.

Now there will be no more payments to students unless they are enrolled in college by this May 1. And the whole college program will be phased out over four years, with monthly payments to students being cut 25 percent each year until there are none.

About 800,000 students across the country receive the education payments from Social Security. According to figures gathered by the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, more than 74,000 of these students come from New York State, 27,000 from New Jersey and 10,000 from Connecticut.

The cutbacks came as a surprise to many who were counting on the benefits. The Social Security Administration so far has not notified beneficiaries that the payments will be halted.

WAITING FOR THE COMPUTER

A spokesman for Social Security said that pamphlets explaining the changes were available, but that it would take time to send out individual notices.

"Our computer in Baltimore is pulling out the names," said the spokesman, Rudge Calhoun, "and each one will get a letter sometime in the spring."

By that time it will be all but too late to do anything about it, because to be in college in May generally means being in a semester that starts no later than February.

Students have been receiving word of the changes in many cases from high school guidance counselors and the students have carried the word home to often surprised parents.

Theresa said she learned of the Social Security cutback from her high school counselor, Steve Okolika, who helped her to get into college early.

Miss White's mother, JoAnn, whose husband died a year and half ago, said she was not pleased that the Social Security Administration had not yet notified her of the cutback.

"Theresa came home one day and said: 'I'm going to quit school.'", Mrs. White said at her home in Brooklyn's Dyker Heights section. "I was shocked. I said: 'You're not going to quit school, if I have to scrub floors.'"

Theresa went on to explain, Mrs. White said that she had to leave school and get into college to keep receiving a $359 monthly Social Security check.

"MY HUSBAND'S DREAM"

"I get all sorts of notices from Social Security," Mrs. White said, "They told me this year I could earn $4,440 a year without losing my benefits, instead of $4,080. Big deal, but they said nothing about the thing that's really important to me, Theresa's education. My husband, he was a bookbinder, paid into Social Security all his life. He should have been able to put it into insurance."

There has been concern among educators and parents about the emotional adjustments of children suddenly being shifted from high school to college.

"It's Theresa's dream and it was my husband's dream that she go to college," Mrs. White said. "She's mature enough, I guess, but she's scared. She's only a little girl. It's hard enough for a child to lose a parent and then to have this thing in addition."

"It's scary," Theresa said the other day. "I'm not exactly sure what to expect." She said that her guidance counselor at first had sugested she go the State University branch at Stony Brook, L.I., but Theresa decided against that.

"I'd have to stay in a dorm," she said, "and at 16½ I'm not ready to stay in a dorm."

Theresa said she could live at home and go to Wagner. The trip, she has figured out, will take more than an hour each way and require her to ride three different buses.

At Wagner College Dr. James Keating, the director of admissions, said that he expected no problems in admitting Theresa. "Based on her record." he said, "she's an outstanding student."

But Dr. Keating said Theresa would begin on a reduced program of 12 credits, instead of the normal 15, "to make sure she fits into the college, to make sure she can blend in with the other students."

THREE AT WAGNER

Theresa is one of only three Social Security recipients being given early admission at Wagner. Dr. Keating said no effort had been made to seek out those students. "We would like to ease the financial hardship," Dr. Keating said, "but the same token we recognize our academic responsibility."

Although colleges facing reduced enrollments have been actively seeking students, there has been hesitancy to take on a large number of Social Security recipients for early admission. Some colleges say it would be unethical to take advantage of a loophole. Others say the early-admission students require too much specialized help.

At Hudson Valley Community College in Troy, N.Y., Mary Johnson, the director of admissions, said she had to stop taking applications from students receiving Social Security aid after just over 30 of then had been admitted.

"We're not going to be able to handle any more," Miss Johnson said, "because they have very special requirements." Miss Johnson explained that the early-admission students must have special courses like English and health and physical education to qualify for the high school diplomas, which they earn at the same time they receive college credit. Those classes just filled up, Miss Johnson said.

"We have indications," Mrs. Stratman said, "that a significant number will move on to other colleges in September."

A TEMPORARY SERVICE

But some colleges say they are accepting large numbers of Social Security students for early admission mainly as a temporary service, so the students can get in under the wire. At the Suffolk County Community College in Seldon, L.I., Doris Stratman, the executive assistant to the president, said about 400 of those students had been admitted.

At the City University of New York, Robin Elliott, a spokesman, said that more than 200 Social Security students had applied for early admission, but only 160 could be accepted. "The students have come to us," Mr. Elliott said. "We have not been recruiting them. That could raise ethical questions.

Although many public high schools made strong efforts to get the Social Security students into college before the deadline, some private schools were at first reluctant to do so because of the tuition loss the schools would suffer, according to Joseph Sciame. Mr. Sciame is the director of financial aid at St. Johns University in Queens and is also president of the New York State Financial Aid Administrators Association.

But Mr. Sciame said that most of those private schools went along when they realized that not getting into college could mean that a Social Security student faced the loss of $5,000 to $7,000 in benefits by missing the deadline.

Nevertheless, Mr. Sciame said he had some reservations about admitting students so early.

"A student at 16," he said, "is not ready to enter college in most cases, to break away from friends and family."●

SUMMARY OF THE PRODUCTIVITY AND HUMAN INVESTMENT ACT

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, when I introduced H.R. 5461, the following represents a summary of the Productivity and Human Investment Act.

PRODUCTIVITY AND HUMAN INVESTMENT ACT
SUMMARY OF MAJOR PROVISIONS

PURPOSE

To increase the productive capacity and utilization of the nation's labor force by:

Better preparing youth for entry into the adult labor market and facilitating the transition from school to work;

Enhancing the job skills of the unemployed and underemployed adults through training, education and other remedial services; and Maintaining an effective labor exchange and providing placement, job search assistance, assessment and counseling.

GENERAL INFORMATION

The bill provides for permanent authorization. Authorized appropriation for fiscal year 1983 is $3.6 billion with appropriations for fiscal year 1984 at $4.0 billion, for fiscal year 1985 at $4.4 billion and such sums thereafter.

Title I of the bill describes the labor market area (LMA) responsibility and authority for the delivery of employment and training investment activities. Title II specifies the State role and Title III describes the Federal role.

The distribution of funds among titles is 50 percent for Title I; 15 percent for Title II and 35 percent for Title III.

Each state receives a consolidated grant from the Federal government allocated on a needs-based formula, based on factors that target to the population most in need. The funds are suballocated to LMAs on a similar basis to provide resources for investment activities.

The bill provides a structure within which the resources previously authorized under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973, the Wagner-Peyser Act of 1933, the National Apprenticeship Act of 1937 and the Social Security Act, Part C, title IV, of 1968 (WIN) can be coordinated. The bill also provides a mechanism to integrate activities authorized under the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act of 1962, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Vocational Educational Act of 1963.

TITLE I

The Governor (and State investment board) are authorized to designate labor market areas within the State. Labor market areas are defined as all local governmental units with a population of 200,000 or more except that: adjoining jurisdictions can be added if they constitute part of the labor market area or an SMSA; if there is only one jurisdiction with a population of 200,000 or more than the entire State shall be designated as the labor market area; or if it is determined that an area of less than 200,000 population represents a labor market area. This designation is made in consultation with the chief elected officials of the jurisdictions and appeals of such designations can be made to the Secretary.

Each LMA will establish a labor market area investment board composed of 15 members, a majority of which will represent business and industry. These members will be selected by the chief elected official(s) of the jurisdiction(s) within the LMA. The LMA board, subject to the approval of the chief elected official(s) may constitute itself as a non-profit corporation, utilize employees of local government, or contract for management services as its administrative unit.

The LMA investment board serves as all the councils currently mandated under CETA, the labor market advisory councils under WIN and the local advisory council under the Wagner-Peyser Act. It also has the responsibility to coordinate apprenticeship activities and occupational information within LMAs. Where designated by the State it can serve as the advisory council within the area for vocational education and rehabilitation services activities with the LMA, and can also be designated to coordinate economic development planning with investment activities.

The LMA investment board has the responsibility for planning, contracting for and monitoring investment services. A two year plan is required that is subject to the approval of the chief elected official(s) before it is submitted to the State. Resolution of differences between the board and the elected official(s) rests at the State level.

Funds are allocated to the LMA for three types of activities: youth preparatory programs; remediation and training; and labor-exchange functions. The proposal suggests that of the funds received by the LMA, 30 percent of the funds be apportioned to each activity with allowable flexibility among programs. Ten percent of the total funds to the LMA are reserved for administration.

Wages and allowances are provided on a needs basis accounting for cash income and food stamps. The bill provides for subsistence stipends, participation cost stipends and incentive stipends. Youth participants in entry employment experience are considered as FLSA student learners for the purposes of determining wages.

Youth preparatory programs

The funds are allocated to this program on the basis of, one-third distributed according to the share of youth age 14–19, two-thirds distributed according to the share of non-employed population age 14–19.

There are four types of programs specified as youth preparatory programs: education for employment; pre-employment skills training; entry employment experience; and school-to-work transition assistance.

The pre-employment skills training program focuses on youth aged 14–16 who plan to enter the labor market upon graduation, do not meet established levels of academic achievement and have family incomes below 100 percent BLS. The activity calls for up to 200 hours of instruction/activities to include assessment, counseling, occupational exploration, job search assistance, and job holding/survival skills.

Entry employment experience is designed for youth between the ages of 16 and 19 who have completed the pre-employment skills training, have not experienced a regular full or part-time job, have searched for a job and are enrolled in school. Priority for these activities is established for those youth who are not going on to college and who come from families with incomes below 100 percent BLS. Two types of employment experience are described: in public, nonprofit agencies in jobs for community betterment and try-out employment in private, for-profit worksites.

Education for employment activities are targeted to youth below the age of 20 who do not have a high school diploma/high school dropouts, and then to those who are at risk of dropping out. The emphasis is on the use of learning centers in a variety of settings with curricula devised to prepare students to meet GED requirements.

School-to-work transition activities can be provided to high school seniors who do plan to enter the full time labor market upon graduation, with priority to those schools with a majority of students with family incomes below 100 percent BLS. Activities include job search assistance, job clubs, placement and job development and follow-up.

Remediation and training activities

The funds are allocated to this program on the basis of the proportion of labor-market related economic hardship factors.

Individuals are eligible for participation if they are beyond high school age, have been earning less than the minimum wage over a six month period, and reside in a family with combined earnings of family members that are less than 70 percent BLS equivalent over the six month period.

Each participant shall be assessed to assure that remediation and training are necessary and will have participated in job search assistance.

Three types of training activities are included: first-tier training; second-tier training; and job access assistance. First-tier training is training of up to 1,000 hours and includes occupational training, employability skills training, remedial education, OJT, and work and training combinations allowing not more than 500 hours of subsidized work experience. Each participant will receive an agreement that specified objectives, allowances, attendance and progress requirements.

Second-tier training consists of activities requiring over 1,000 hours of participation but totaling not more than two years. Allowable activities include occupational training and retraining, postsecondary education and Business/Labor Advanced Career Training Programs (contracts with private business for combinations of OJT and institutionalized training plus subsidized internship assignments; specifications are suggested for these contracts). Second-tier activities are targeted to successful completers of first-tier activities and youth preparatory activities.

Job Access Assistance consists of incentives to employers to facilitate placement of individuals. Allowable activities are try-out employment of up to 250 hours, employment bonuses, and TJTC and WIN tax credits.

Labor exchange activities

The funds for this program are allocated on the basis of shares of unemployment. The Secretary shall provide a comprehensive guide to assure consistency of data and MIS information.

Each local board is to maintain a network of local offices to provide comprehensive labor exchange services, labor market information gathering and dissemination, testing and assessment, intake, referral and placement. The local board can contract for these services with several delivery agents.

Placement services are available to any applicant along with counseling, assessment and testing. Job search assistance will be provided to individuals who lack job-seeking and applicant skills. Without job search assistance, no individual can be referred to remediation and training programs. The special needs of veterans, the handicapped and those with limited English speaking ability must be met.

TITLE II

Twenty-five percent of the funds available to the State shall be used for oversight and support of local board activities; fifty percent shall be used for State incentive grants; and twenty-five percent shall be used for State-operated investment activities.

The State shall establish a State investment board to assume all the responsibilities of the State Employment and Training Councils, State Occupational Information Coordinating Committees, State Coordinating Committee for the Work Incentive Program and, if specified by the Governor, the board can consolidate the functions of the State Advisory Councils on Apprenticeship, Vocational Education and Adult Education.

A majority of the State investment board will be representatives from business and industry appointed by the Governor to three-year terms. The board is precluded from providing direct services to eligible participants. The Governor approves the plans and decisions of the State board.

The State investment board prepares a two-year State plan that subsumes the separate approved plans of all local boards within the State and that describes the oversight and support activities, priorities for State incentive grants and performance goals for State operated programs.

The Secretary of Labor sets out minimum requirements for the two-year State plan; reviews the State plan and indicates areas of violation; and investigates where corrective actions or modifications are not clear.

Oversight and Support Activities at the State level include the designation of LMAs with consultation of chief elected officials; annual auditing and monitoring (fiscal control and fund accounting procedures must be established); establishment of a management information system which provides as a minimum information specified in Federal guidelines; establishment of uniform competency standards and standards and statewide certifications; and provisions of technical assistance.

The State investment board can use up to 20 percent of its allocation to establish State incentive grants to influence the service and participant mix, and delivery agents and service approaches of local boards. The State investment board with the approval of the Governor, can designate certain activities, target groups, delivery agents or management and delivery approaches as priorities for funding and establish condition for receipt of these funds. Matching may be required.

State operated investment activities comprise programs established to provide advanced career training activities for individuals drawn from local board programs throughout the State; to provide assistance for intrastate and interstate relocation to secure employment; and to provide services to special needs groups within the State.

Advanced career training opportunities and limited to participants who have completed first-tier activities. These positions cannot be refilled unless three out of four completers have been placed in employment.

Relocation assistance is available as a means of assisting participants to become permanently employed and self-supporting.

TITLE III

The funds available under this title are allocated as follows: 50% for Job Corps; 5 percent for economic distress programs; 5 percent each for Native American, Seasonal Farmworker Programs, and Business/Labor Advanced Career Training Programs; 20 percent for Performance Supplements; 7 percent for Program Improvement and Supportive Services; and 2 percent for the National Labor Force Investment Board.

Federal responsibility is directed toward national oversight and support for State and LMA activities and to address labor force problems that are of national scope and cannot be met through the services of a single LMA of State.

The Secretary shall seek to coordinate activities with other Federal policies and national needs with the Department of Defense, Agriculture and Transportation, the Office of Personnel Management and the Corps of Engineers and the Department of Education.

Economic distress programs provide training, retraining, job search assistance, placement, relocation assistance and other aid to individuals affected by mass layoff, natural disasters, and other factors for which State and Labor Market Area resources have not been planned. This assistance can be coordinated best at the Federal level and is to be provided through the services of national intermediaries.

Oversight responsibilities include the specification of minimum standards for fiscal accounting and fund control, establishment of a uniform management information system, and development of a performance rating system for distribution of performance supplements.

Program Improvement and Support activities include funds for improvement and development grants to States; Federal research and evaluation; and support of national intermediaries.

The Job Corps is retained as a national program for disadvantaged young men and women ages 14 through 25. Similarly, administration for programs for Indians and migrant and farmworkers is continued at the national level.

The National Labor Force Investment Board is constituted as an independent board to advise the President, Congress and the Secretary concerning national labor force investment policies, programs and practices.●

PASSING OF A BLUES GREAT

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, Sam "Lightnin'" Hopkins spent the last years of his life performing the only original American music—the blues—in and around Houston, Tex. He was a friend and I can remember fondly his imaginative guitar picking and his dark and supple voice. Yet his was a sound that thrilled blues fans all over America—indeed all over the world. He was among the last of the oldtime country bluesmen.

It is only fitting, then, that we take a moment here in this Chamber to note his passing last week. After all, he has spoken for all of America since the 1930's with his story telling—his poetry—his blues.

Born 69 years ago in Centerville, Tex., Lightnin' Hopkins made his first guitar at the age of eight. He was a contemporary of such great blues artists as Muddy Waters, BB King, and John Lee Hooker, and his music influenced a whole generation of rock music in the 1960's and early 1970's. Most fans remember him for "Rocky Mountain," his first song; "Mrs. Charlie;" "Coffee Blues;" "Short Haired Woman" and "Annie Mae."

His death is a loss to his native Texas, the country, and the great American tradition that is the blues. Lightnin' Hopkins once said, "You can meet a friend where a dollar can't spend. Amen."—to which I reply "Amen." It is a simple statement but infinitely wise. So I ask now that you share in that pure wisdom, that you take a moment to read the following article about the passing of a legend:

SAM (LIGHTNIN') HOPKINS, 69; BLUES SINGER AND GUITARIST

(By Wolfgang Saxon)

Sam (Lightnin') Hopkins, one of the great country blues singers and perhaps the greatest single influence on rock guitar players, died Saturday in Houston, where he made his home. He would have been 70 years old next month.

A contemporary of Muddy Waters, B. B. King and John Lee Hooker, he was one of the last of the original blues artists.

Mr. Hopkins began to sing the blues as a child in his native Texas. He started to sing professionally in the 1930's, gaining recognition beyond his home state with an intense style that he used to phrase his songs of suffering and death. In his dark and supple voice, he would evoke his past as a field hand and rambler to the accompaniment of highly imaginative guitar work.

His instrument often became a second voice to discourse with, or to end his vocal phrases. It also enhanced his reputation for flair, wit and improvisational skill.

A SPONTANEOUS STYLE

On his guitar, Mr. Hopkins would alternate ominous single-note runs on the high strings with a hard-driving bass in irregular rhythms that matched his spontaneous, conversational lyrics.

His recording and fame had preceded the lean, lanky minstrel when he first ventured North in 1960 for a concert in Carnegie Hall and appearances at the Village Gate.

The Carnegie Hall concert was a benefit hootenanny that also featured the young Joan Baez. Mr. Hopkins performed his frequently bitter and sardonic, introspective and autobiographical songs, and also swapped verses with Pete Seeger and Bill McAdoo, a young folk singer from Detroit.

But his art was best suited for the more intimate surroundings of a club like the Village Gate, where he sang of unfulfilled love and unappreciated devotion. "The blues form may seem simple and limiting," reported Robert Shelton in his review in The New York Times, "but at the hands of a master his sentiments burgeoned into a subtle exploration of moods."

Mr. Hopkins returned to the Village Gate in 1962 for a joint appearance with Sabicas, the Spanish flamenco guitarist. Playing out his moody, subjectively ruminating songs on a $65 guitar, he added an unusually lighthearted number, "Happy Blues for John Glenn," after having watched the television reports on the astronaut's orbital flight around the world.

BLUES ACCORDIN' TO LIGHTIN'

By that time, Mr. Hopkins, a regular on Houston's Dowling Street, had recorded more than 200 singles and 10 albums in 42 year of singing.

He appeared in 1970 in a short film, "Blues Accordin' to Lightin' Hopkins," a tribute to his musicianship, a study of his brand of music, as well as a celebration of his way of life.

Mr. Hopkins was at Carnegie Hall again, in 1979, for a four-hour Boogie 'n Blues concert and appeared for the last time in New York the following year for a three-night stand at Tramps on East 15th Street.

Sam Hopkins was born March 15, 1912, in Centerville, Tex., a small cotton town, north of Houston, surrounded by red-clay country. At 8, he made his first guitar and had his brother teach him basic guitar blues, enough to get him started as a musician.

He left school about that time to travel in Texas, sometimes as a hobo and occasionally working as a farmhand; he also did other odd jobs and played the guitar at county fairs and picnics. During those ramblings, he encountered Blind Lemon Alexander, the most popular Texas blues singer at the time, and his cousin, Texas Alexander, who sang but didn't play the guitar; he took young Sam on as accompanist.

It became a lasting association. Mr. Hopkins and Texas Alexander, a singer with a voice like barbed wire, worked theaters and both could still be heard together on Houston street corners and city buses in the early 1950's.

Mr. Hopkins had returned to Houston in 1945 after years of wandering around the South. Ten years later—he had become well known throughout Texas by then—the country blues were at a low as popular music and he fell into obscurity.

But a musicologist, Sam Charters, "rediscovered" him in the late 1950's and introduced him to a new generation of blues fans, this time across the country.

"The last of the blues is almost gone," Mr. Hopkins noted just a few years ago when he had his national fame well in place, "and the ones who doin' it now got to either get a record or sit 'round me and learn my stuff, 'cause that all that they can go by."●

SUNSET AND THE NEW FEDERALISM

HON. GILLIS W. LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the Subcommittee on the Legislative Process has just published "A Compilation of State Sunset Statutes With Background Information on State Sunset Laws."

This volume was designed as a reference work for those interested in sunset, oversight, and program review. In addition to the statutes, it contains an annotated bibliography on sunset legislation as well as introductory material outlining what Congress has done in this area and what the States have accomplished.

Judging from the requests we are getting for this volume, and the telephone calls coming in from all over the country, interest in oversight has not diminished. The consequences of the New Federalism will be spreading rapidly. If the States feel they will have to assume the burdens that are now Federal, we are bound to see renewed interest in the techniques of monitoring program delivery at all levels of government.●

A TIME FOR RENEWAL: THE F. D. R. LEGACY IN A TIME OF DESPAIR

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 28, 1982

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, because this is a special time that we have set aside to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, I would like to bring to your attention the upcoming F. D. R. Labor teach-in that local No. 174 of the United Auto Workers Union will hold on Friday, February 6. I think it is most appropriate that we pause and pay tribute to F. D. R., and that labor organizations like the UAW set aside time to reflect upon his vision of how government ought to humanely and adequately serve its citizens.

When I think back to the legacy of F. D. R., when I remember the greatness of his achievements, I keep returning to the idea of renewal. History reminds us that the state of affairs F. D. R. inherited on his inaugural day was not enviable. Nearly one-third of the population was unemployed, and those lucky enough to secure jobs worked long hours, barely earning subsistence wages. Millions were forced to depend upon the charity of the soup kitchens and to seek shelter in shanties that euphemistically came to be called Hoovervilles. Very few citizens realize that soup kitchens are reappearing with alarming frequency in depressed communities in our country.

When F. D. R. took office, he rekindled the hope of a nation by putting American people back to work. Newly hired Federal employees reclaimed and planted thousands of acres of forest, built more than 11,000 schools and libraries and other public facilities. His deep commitment to economic and social equality, and his belief that these ideals should be practiced at every level of government, are embodied in the legislative reforms that were instituted during his administration. He pushed for reforms in the area of banking and finance, in creating some measure of security for the elderly, in eliminating sweatshops and enabling the working class to organize for collective bargaining. These reforms continue to shape the nature of our Government today.

F. D. R. understood that the Federal Government, acting in the context of a developed industrial society, had national responsibilities. He believed that if Government is to meet the most basic needs of its citizens, it must strive to provide adequate employment opportunities and access to decent, humane health care. Far from being outside the role of Government as our forefathers envisioned it, these national responsibilities logically stem from the development of our economic and social systems. We all know that national and international events can very well dictate if an automobile worker in Detroit has a job. I believe, as President Roosevelt did, that it is the duty of the National Government to mediate between these national and international developments and the employment situations of workers in our cities. Rather than decreasing the role of the Federal Government, we should be increasing it. We see that other nations of the world with which we compete are increasing the role of the government in the operation of their economies.

Yet, our President has expressed a desire for each of the States to devise their own solutions to the problems of unemployment, and other national concerns, while severely limiting the resources they have been allotted to cope with these problems. It is clear that the States, left alone and acting in their own best interest, are powerless to counteract international developments that are wreaking havoc on the local level.

For that reason, I feel it is a cruel irony that we come to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the birth of F. D. R. during this current Presidential administration. It is cruel because we are facing times that demand the excellent leadership that President Roosevelt provided us; yet surely, that excellence of leadership is not forthcoming from the current administration.

We must have the resolve to build on the legacy of Roosevelt, the vision to recognize its errors, and the courage to build upon its strengths. None of this is possible unless the American people are educated about the ideas and programs that were put forth during the Roosevelt administration. The teach-in sponsored by local No. 174 of the United Auto Workers Union is an example of what needs to be done if we are to turn the tide of reactionary policy that is emanating from our National Government. I commend the local for its efforts, and recommend its activities to other locals across the Nation.●

THE FUTURE OF THE U.S. FIRE ADMINISTRATION

HON. DOUG WALGREN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, since 1974 the U.S. Fire Administration (USFA) has been responsible for coordinating and mobilizing a national program to reduce this country's shocking loss of life and property in fires. The USFA serves as the lead Federal agency responsible for addressing the fire problem. However, the administration proposes to severely reduce funding and eliminate most elements of its organization.

Upcoming National Bureau of Standards authorization hearings to be held by the Subcommittee on Science, Research, and Technology of the Committee on Science and Technology will in part focus on the adminstration's proposals for funding the USFA. The hearings will also review the administration's specific budget proposals and will focus on important policy questions involving the activities of the National Bureau of Standards, the Office of Productivity, Technology, and Innovation, and the National Technical Information Service. The hearings are scheduled for February 9, 1:30 p.m. in room 2325 Rayburn and February 10, at 1:30 p.m. in room 2318 Rayburn.

I would like to share with my colleagues a recent article written by Hal Bruno and published in the February 1982 Firehouse magazine:

FIRE POLITICS—USFA: RALLYING FOR SURVIVAL

(By Hal Bruno)

WASHINGTON, D.C.—After a year of uncertainty and unheeded warnings, the worst fears of the fire service have been realized: the Reagan administration will abolish the U.S. Fire Administration (USFA) unless Congress or the White House overrules a budget-cutting decision made by the Office of Management and Budget (OMB).

Budget Director David Stockman's axe fell when OMB chopped $9 million from the $15 million the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) had requested for USFA's fiscal 1983 budget. If the cut is allowed to stand, the Fire Administration will cease to exist on October 1, with only the National Fire Academy surviving in FEMA's Emergency Management Institute.

As this column reported several times last year, USFA has been on shaky ground since the day President Reagan was inaugurated. It had not fared well under the previous administration and the beginning of the end may have occurred when President Carter's reorganization plan transferred it from the Department of Commerce to the newly created FEMA. There was concern at the time that a national effort to reduce this country's fire death toll was being given low priority by politicians and federal bureaucrats.

AN EXPENDABLE AGENCY?

From the start, the Fire Administration has been victimized in part by its own muddling and internal power struggles, conflicting ideas from the fire service, declining support in Congress and disinterest in the White House. What finally may do it in is a combination of these factors plus simple economics: the Reagan administration is determined to make even bigger cuts in the 1983 budget and the USFA is viewed as an expendable agency that can be lopped off without too much political trouble.

What began nine years ago with high hopes has ended up as a bitter disappointment for every firefighter—paid or volunteer. America Burning, the much-heralded report of the National Commission on Fire Prevention and Control, was published in 1973 and called for a "permanent federal agency specifically concerned with fire." This agency was to collect data, evaluate the nationwide fire problem, conduct research, provide special training at a national academy and administer federal bloc grants for the states to aid local fire departments where needed. The aim was to mobilize and coordinate a national program to reduce this country's appalling loss of life and property in fires.

CONSTANT TURMOIL

Established under the Ford administration, the USFA suffered from constant turmoil during the Carter years. Then came the conservative Reagan administration, committed to a balanced budget and a philosophy that the federal government should get out of state and local affairs. Fire was viewed as a local problem, though there was some acknowledgement that fire departments needed help in handling problems that were national in scope, such as arson and hazardous materials. But with its short, troubled history, bureaucratic weakness, lack of political clout and the Reagan philosophy of federal withdrawal, the USFA was a sitting duck for David Stockman's budget cutters. Many in the fire service were unduly optimistic when USFA escaped with only minor budget reductions in fiscal '82, but—as this column warned last year—the worst blow was yet to come (see "Fire Politics," Firehouse May 1981).

The blow came at a mid-December meeting with OMB, where FEMA Director Louis Guiffrida attempted to save the Fire Administration's 1983 funding, but could only salvage $6 million for the fire academy. (The National Fire Data Center also may survive as part of FEMA.) "There was no money for the Fire Administration," a FEMA official says, ". . . but we were assured that the academy would not be touched."

He points out that this OMB slash is "only the beginning of the budget process." Congress could override OMB's cut and restore the funds when the 1983 budget comes up for review in the House and Senate. That will depend on how much political pressure the fire service is able to muster. In the past, firefighters have had both success and failure in rounding up congressional support; the battle to save USFA will be a showdown test of how effective the fire lobby can be and if it has enough of a constituency for Congress to pay attention.

The same applies to the White House, which also has the power to reverse the OMB decision. The Fire Administration can be saved if President Reagan or the men around him want to save it. That too depends on generating a political reaction that makes itself felt in high places. Thus far, fire organizations have not had much impact on the Reagan crowd, partly because of their inability to present a united front.

RALLYING TROOPS

So it's up to the fire service to get its own act together and rally grass-roots political support. "That's where our focus is, contacting congressmen in their home districts," says Donald Flinn, general manager of the International Association of Fire Chiefs. "The battle is up on Capitol Hill and there are friends who want to keep the program viable . . . but it's up to the troops in the field to put the heat on their congressmen." The Joint Council of Fire Service Organizations is holding a series of meetings to plan a unified strategy, and a list of USFA's accomplishments has been compiled for presentation to OMB, Congress, the White House and anyone who will listen.

In fairness, it should be mentioned that fire is not being singled out for harsh treatment. What happened to USFA is part of a larger pattern in which OMB is using a clever, new tactic to force the 1983 budget cuts. Instead of merely chopping at items, Stockman's crew now proposes wiping out entire agencies and programs in one bloody stroke, then sitting back to see how much dust is kicked up. If not much happens, OMB has its way; but if a political storm breaks out, they "compromise" and settle for a massive budget cut instead of total demolition. The threatened agency and its supporters figure they've lucky to get out alive and accept the huge cut in exchange for survival. Congress or the White House takes credit for saving a beleaguered constituency from OMB and everybody goes home, shaken but grateful.

It's a rough, tricky political game, but it's the only game in town these days and the fire service had better play it well if they hope to save what's left of the U.S. Fire Administration.●

GAYLORD NELSON PROTESTS WATT AIDE'S MOVE AGAINST ENERGY LOBBYIST

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, Gaylord Nelson, the distinguished former Senator from Wisconsin and founder of Earth Day, who is now chairman of the Wilderness Society, has written to me in anguish and anger over a recent incident in which Timothy Donohoe, a Washington lobbyist for an energy company, was fired after an Interior Department official wrote to his employer because Mr. Donohoe had questioned, in a personal letter, one of Secretary Watt's more extreme statements. I share entirely Senator Nelson's feelings in this matter and I wanted to share his letter with my colleagues today.

The letter lays out the facts of the case. To my knowledge, these facts have not been disputed by the Interior Department to date, nor has the Department directly addressed the profound issues this incident raises. Mr. Donohoe sent a letter to Secretary Watt asking for clarification of his remark that the political world is not divided between Republicans and Democrats but between "liberals and Americans." Mr. Watt's Assistant Secretary for Congressional and Legislative Affairs, Stanley Hulett, went through the effort to find out who employed Mr. Donohoe and wrote a letter to the company president expressing Secretary Watt's "surprise" at the employee's letter. Mr. Donohoe never got a response to his inquiry. Instead, he was fired for his "poor judgment."

It seems to me that Secretary Watt has enough problems with the American public that he does not need some overzealous staff person worrying about the ideological purity of a single energy company executive. That it is Mr. Donohoe who is accused of "poor judgment" is ironic. That he should suffer for exercising his right of free speech and at the hands of an administration that makes much of Americanism is outrageous.

That the Department would even care about Mr. Donohoe's private beliefs, and that the company in question would then submit to this kind of pressure, speaks volumes about what is going on in Washington these days.

I do not think that I have ever seen anything like this in my 20 years in Washington and it seems to me that if Secretary Watt does not condone this sort of behavior, that he should take steps to stop it.

The letter follows:

THE WILDERNESS SOCIETY,
Washington, D.C., January 29, 1982.

Hon. MORRIS K. UDALL,
Room 235, Cannon Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MO: The Washington Post and the New York Times this week carried reports about an energy company executive, Timothy L. Donohoe, who was fired for writing a personal letter to James Watt questioning the Secretary's statement to California farmers: "I don't use the words 'Democrats' and 'Republicans' . . . It's liberals and Americans."

Mr. Donohoe took exception to having his patriotism questioned, and it cost him his job.

I have been an outspoken critic of Secretary Watt because I believe his policies and actions represent a serious threat to the environment and the public lands. But no action since he became Secretary more than a year ago has caused me more concern than the undisguised and heavy-handed use of arbitrary power against an individual American who happened to have honest differences with Mr. Watt.

Mr. Donohoe worked for a Dallas energy company, Enserch, which holds 324 oil and gas leases on federal land and also has lease applications pending before the Department of Interior.

Therefore, it could only have had a chilling effect on the chairman of Enserch to receive a very pointed letter from Stanley Hulett, Interior's Secretary for Congressional and Legislative Affairs and a key aide to Mr. Watt, relating that "the Secretary is, frankly, surprised at Mr. Donohoe's representation in the attached letter."

One can only conclude that the Interior Department was sending a clear signal that, not only was the Secretary displeased, but that action by Enserch was expected.

The implications of this are enormous. 118 million acres of federal land have been leased to private oil and gas companies. Thousands of lease applications are pending. The Department of Interior decides what applicant shall be granted a lease and sets the guidelines that must be followed in exploring and extracting oil and gas.

Is not this whole episode a threatening signal to all who do business with the Interior Department? Rarely has Washington seen such a raw abuse of power.

This case is a reprehensible example of a consistent pattern of inflammatory and divisive statements that Mr. Watt set when he first took office and has followed ever since. The record shows beyond doubt that he has created a climate of abusive intimidation and retaliation in dealing with people or organizations who disagree with him or his policies.

Mr. Watt made this clear early in his administration. Last March in his first major policy speech, to national park concessioners, he said: "We mean business, and when you read the press you're going to find out that I can be cold and calculating, and indeed I can . . . If a personality is giving you a problem, we're going to get rid of the problem or the personality, whichever is faster."

During Mr. Watt's confirmation hearings a year ago, he pledged "to listen, to reach out" and to "open up" channels of communication. His words and actions have made a mockery of that pledge.

In December, Mr. Watt ordered Department of Interior officials not to meet with or talk to professional conservationists.

Addressing the Board of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, many members of which are regularly involved in matters before the Interior Department, Mr. Watt chastised corporate leaders whose companies make contributions to conservation organizations, specifically naming The Wilderness Society, Sierra Club, National Wildlife Federation, and the National Audubon Society.

"The battle is not one of environmental rules. The battle is over a philosophy of government," he said. "Are we going to have a centralized, socialized planned economy as we had in the last administration, or are we going to a market-oriented system?"

The Legal Times of Washington reported recently that Mr. Watt has complained about energy companies' hiring of Carter administration officials as lawyers or consultants, and that the Interior Department has made it known that Democratic counsel will not be welcome at the agency.

Addressing park concessioners, he denounced decades of Congresses, administrations, and cabinet members by declaring that he was going "to change 40-50 years of bad government."

He has pitted western states against eastern states and turned America's land and natural resources into a sectional, political battleground.

The Reagan administration says it wants to get the government off the backs of individual Americans. Yet, one individual who had the temerity to question Mr. Watt's assertion that liberals are un-American suddenly found the full weight of the Interior Department on his back, and was fired.

Mr. Watt tries to pass off as a joke his distinction between "liberals and Americans." As the Donohoe firing demonstrates, that kind of mean remark coming from Secretary Watt is neither a joke nor empty rhetoric. As he said himself, "We mean business."

Mr. Watt has become a spokesman for discord and intimidation that have no place in our free society, and certainly not in the Cabinet of the United States.

Sincerely,

GAYLORD NELSON,
Chairman.●

PROGRESS OF LAND REFORM PROCESS IN EL SALVADOR

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, land reform in El Salvador has been the subject of much discussion in recent weeks, particularly because of reported dissatisfaction about the scope and progress of the Agrarian reform program. Prof. Roy Prosterman, professor of law at the University of Washington, lays out some of the facts of El Salvador's program which seem to be forgotten or overlooked in the ongoing discussion. I urge my colleagues to keep in mind Professor Prosterman's comments.

His comments follow:

PROGRESS OF LAND REFORM PROCESS IN EL SALVADOR

I have worked with El Salvador's major democratic campesino organization, the Union Comunal Salvadorena, since February 1980 on the Salvadoran land-reform process. I have yet to see any discussion as careless of the facts as the article by E. Bradford Burns (Editorial Pages, Dec. 30). He misrepresents virtually every major aspect of a land reform that has taken 44 percent of Salvador's cultivated land and benefitted 70 percent of its landless families.

Burns states that coffeelands "were untouched." But the best available data indicates that around 79,000 acres of coffeeland, 22 percent of the country's total, were in the nationalized large estates. (A further 40 percent of coffeeland was already in small and medium holdings under 100 acres.) This isn't a quarrel over precise percentages, however: "untouched" plainly means zero, and Burns' statement is untrue.

He tells us the reform's first phase nationalized "some" large estates over 1,250 acres, contriving to suggest that most were unaffected. In fact, substantially all such estates were nationalized: 263 of them, containing about 23 percent of Salvador's cultivated land. A handful may have escaped the net, but no one has seriously contended that any significant number remain unexpropriated.

He states that "the government announced postponement" of the remaining two stages of the reform, including "the distribution to peasants of the small plots that they previously rented." Burns' statement as to rented land is flatly untrue. On April 28, 1980, the Salvadoran government decreed immediate expropriation, by operation of law, of all tenanted and sharecropped lands, for universal, inplace transfer, thus taking a further 21 percent of all cultivated land.

The rights conferred upon all 150,000 tenant and sharecropper families were immediate, though these were to be memorialized with formal titles. At year-end 1981 about 30,000 applications had been processed and more than 20,000 provisional titles issued—the titling should be speeded up, as I have said for a year. But when Burns refers to an "announced postponement" for rented lands, he is saying something very different, and wholly fictitious.

His suggestion that there was increased frustration giving rise to greater leftist violence by early 1981 is likewise erroneous, though harder to quantify. Most of the violence has come from the far-right. The left failed miserably in their January 1981 "final offensive" and, as reporter Alan Riding wrote in the New York Times (Feb. 8, 1981) "they apparently miscalculated the impact on peasants of land reforms decreed by the junta." Acting Archbishop Rivera y Damas concurred. The left today is chiefly blowing up powerlines and bridges—terrorist tactics that virtually concede bankruptcy on gaining popular support.●

SOUTH AFRICAN HOMELAND TENSE AFTER GUERRILLA ATTACK

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, because of its direct relevance to interest in this country concerned with human rights and freedoms of persons in South Africa under apartheid, I call attention to the following detailed reporting on violations of such rights and freedoms in the area of Venda as reported in the Washington Post, dated February 3, of this year. As may be inferred from the report, South Africa remains in the eyes of the world internationally responsible for the promotion, respect and observance of human rights in Venda.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 3, 1982]

SOUTH AFRICAN HOMELAND TENSE AFTER GUERRILLA ATTACK

(By Allister Sparks)

THOHOYANDOU, VENDA.—Nerves are taut in the tribal homeland of Venda after an attack by African nationalist guerrillas and a police sweep that followed in which 18 prominent people, including several churchmen, have been detained without charge.

The detentions, as well as other police actions, have engendered an atmosphere of fear and suspicion among authorities and residents alike in this beautiful, remote little territory that was given nominal independence by South Africa two years ago.

[Monday Bishop Desmond Tutu, general secretary of the South African Council of Churches, said he had been expelled from Venda after trying to visit the detained clergy.

[Speaking in Johannesburg, the black Anglican bishop, one of the most outspoken opponents of South Africa's system of apartheid, or racial separation, said he and the council president, the Rev. Peter Storey, were expelled over the weekend.]

The tribal administration of the homeland, which South Africa installed although 80 percent of the population had voted against it, reacted sharply after an attack by African National Congress guerrillas on a police station in the main town of Sibasa last Oct. 26.

It feels particularly nervous because Venda is vulnerably situated near the borders of Zimbabwe and Mozambique, both of whose governments sympathize with the guerrillas' attempts to overthrow white minority rule in South Africa, whose independent homeland policy is a fundamental component of apartheid.

Among those detained since the police station attack have been three Lutheran pastors and their dean.

One died within 24 hours of his detention, and people who saw the body said it bore injuries indicating that the man, Tshifhiwa Juofhe, a young lay member of the church, had been beaten to death.

The dean, Simon Farisani, was reported hospitalized by other patients who said they saw him limp through the corridors with a badly swollen face. Earlier this month, the chief of the national force, Brig. Gen. Tshikhakhisa Mulaudzi, denied that the dean had been in the hospital.

He also denied persistent rumors that other detainees have been badly beaten. The police, he said, "are just asking questions."

In addition to the detentions, other indications of official edginess include frequent roadblocks at which travelers are stopped and searched, and the deportation of two clergymen who helped Muofhe's widow. The Lutheran bishop for the northern region of South Africa, Solomon Serote, was turned back from a roadblock when he tried to enter Venda to conduct Muofhe's funeral.

As a result of such actions, people say they are afraid to speak out.

The dean's wife, Regina Farisani, said she did not want to discuss her husband because she might be detained and there would be no one to look after their two young daughters.

A friendly official warned that all rooms in the only hotel in the capital, Thohoyandou, are bugged.

Even Serote, 100 miles away in the northern Transvaal town of Seshego, unplugged his telephone, which he suspected might contain a bugging device, before an interview.

The United States National Committee of Lutheran World Ministers has issued a strongly worded protest through its general secretary, the Rev. Paul A. Wee, at the treatment of the churchmen, and Amnesty International has announced it will investigate the detentions and reports of torture.

The homeland of Venda is one of the territories demarcated for the country's 11 main tribal groups by South Africa's white minority government to secure the main part of the country for whites. The homelands are being developed and coaxed toward independence in the face of strong opposition from African nationalists.

As a homeland gets independence all blacks whose ethnic origins relate them to the tribe concerned automatically become its citizens, wherever they live, and lose their South African citizenship.

One of four homelands to be given independence so far, Venda is the most remote, tucked away in the northeast corner of the country. It is a scenically beautiful little territory of forested hills and lush grassland just north of the Tropic of Capricorn. It is 2,300 square miles, less than half the size of Connecticut, and has a population of 400,000.

Patrick Mphephu, the man South Africa chose to carry out the homeland policy here, is a semiliterate clan chieftain.

South Africa created for him the position of paramount chief, which had never existed among the Venda before.

Opposed to Mphephu was a university-trained sociologist, Baldwin Mudau, whose policy initially was to opt for independence and then seek union with Zimbabwe.

The first elections in 1973 were under a constitution that provided for 18 elected members and 42 nominated chiefs and traditional headmen. Mudau won 14 of the elected seats, but after the chiefs and headmen had been feted at a nearby resort, all supported Mphephu and he became chief minister.

For the pre-independence elections in 1978, Mudau again won handsomely, but Mphephu then detained several of Mudau's elected members under emergency powers given by Pretoria until after Parliament had voted him prime minister. A year later he was installed as president.

With power and an annual aid budget of more than $50 million from South Africa came status and affluence for the largely uneducated chiefs and headmen allied to Mphephu.

They acquired large limousines and huge houses in the midst of an overwhelmingly peasant community.

They also attracted the friendship of businessmen with a sharp eye for an opportunity, and Venda is rife with rumors of corruption.

The guerrilla attack hit this scene like a bombshell.

"They know they have no roots of popular support and they panicked," said one of the deported clergymen, Faure Louw, whose Dutch Reform Church is one of the bastions of support for the South African government and the homelands policy.

"But I know most of these people [who were detained]. They were involved in church affairs and are strongly against violence," Louw said. "I am certain they had nothing to do with any subversion."

A statement issued by the vice president Khosi Madzivhandila, justified the detentions on the grounds that the attack on the police station was by "revolutionaries and terrorists" and that "it is the right of every government to protect itself and its people."

Brig. Gen. Mulaudzi, who expressed anger at the press for maligning Venda, refused to discuss the dead detainee, saying the matter was being investigated.

Mulaudzi, formerly with the South African security police, said he saw nothing wrong with detention without charges.

"We do not call it detention without trial," he said. "It is a form of investigation. I think it is the best way. When you have a person there, by himself without any influence from others, then you get the correct information."●

INSIDE INSIGHT AT THE ENERGY DEPARTMENT

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, even those of us in Congress who sit on the committees which oversee the Department of Energy's work often have difficulty getting a true picture of the attitudes of employees and the leadership provided by the middle-level management. On Friday, February 5, however, the author of a letter to the editor of the Washington Post did give us a glimpse of what is happening within the agency. Perhaps Mr. Reagan's apparent plan to dismantle the Department of Energy has already been carried out in secret for the part 12 months.

For the benefit of those who may not have seen this revealing letter, I am reproducing it here. It should be noted that the author, Mr. Keith R. Hinman, was recently an employee at the Department of Energy.

NEWSPEAK AT DOE

I recently quit my job at the Department of Energy in dismay and disgust. I believe my criticisms of the department's policies and management are shared by many still at DOE.

The Reagan administration's energy policy is both incoherent and inconsistent. While loudly proclaiming a "market-oriented" policy, this administration has backed away from natural gas decontrol and from lifting the ban on oil exports from Alaska. It has continued massive subsidies to nuclear energy and synthetic fuels (apparently, "supply-side" subsidies are okay). Worst of all, the administration's faith in private economic forces has prevented it from preparing contingency plans for dealing with a future supply crisis.

DOE's incompetent managers neither desire nor appreciate good staff work, and staff demoralization is endemic. Thought and analysis have been replaced by the endless repetition of fatuous "free market" catechisms, creating an almost Orwellian atmosphere of Newspeak. Not surprisingly, those with options or pride are getting out. Meanwhile, nine years after the Arab oil embargo, the nation remains woefully unprepared for the next energy crisis.

THE STATE OF THE UNION IGNORES THE STATE OF THE ECONOMY

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan's state of the Union address was disappointing.

The President failed to recognize the most pressing issues facing our Nation—the deep recession, rising unemployment, large budget deficits, and high interest rates.

One year ago, President Reagan sketched out a far-reaching economic program designed to reduce inflation, increase employment, and foster economic growth. The President launched this Nation on a test of supply-side economics using the economic welfare of our country as the guinea pig. When the President proposed his plan to cut taxes, increase defense spending, reduce social spending, and balance the budget, many economists said that it would not work. Even Vice President BUSH called it voodoo economics. Economists predicted huge budget deficits and record high interest rates.

After long, difficult bargaining wars, Congress passed all of the essential elements of the President's economic program. The President received cuts in Federal spending for social programs, large increases for defense spending, and a massive cut in corporate and personal income taxes. It is important to note that not only was the funding reduced for most Federal programs, but in many cases programs were eliminated entirely. With just one vote, Congress conceded to the President's wishes by adopting a single piece of legislation which made changes in more than 250 existing programs and laws.

People are now beginning to realize the full impact of what has been taking place in these past 12 months. Instead of cutting only the fat—that is the "fraud, waste, and abuse"—from the Federal budget, the knife is cutting the arteries that support the economic survival of our Nation's poor and working citizens. The administration's economic program strikes at working Americans, at the poor and the elderly in a harsh and cruel way. At the same time, the administration's policies reward the powerful and the superrich.

A distinguished Republican Senator from Oregon, MARK HATFIELD, recently described this economic program very accurately by saying that the administration's new Federal policy is a "policy of taking and cutting from the truly needy and giving to the truly greedy."

Not only are working Americans suffering under this economic experiment, but the Nation's economy is also suffering. During 1981 we saw economic activity decline steadily, and the Nation is currently in a severe recession. Long-term interest rates that really count for housing and business investment are now higher than in any month during 1980. These high rates in the face of declining inflation indicate a belief that the President's program will lead to even higher rates for years to come. In addition, short-term rates have started to rise again.

An even more disturbing fact is that there are currently more than 9.5 million people officially included in the unemployment statistics in December. This figure under estimates our unemployment problem because more than 1 million people have been so discouraged by economic realities that they have given up actively seeking work and are therefore not counted in the unemployment figures. In addition, during the first week in January, 1 million people filed initial unemployment claims. Furthermore, all of these figures fail to include the families of the unemployed.

These are the realities we face today. They are neither the promise nor the goal of supply-side economics. The current economic situation is very critical, and unless corrective actions are taken, the Nation could be plunged into a depression. We cannot afford to allow this experiment to continue much longer. Even when measured against the goals the President set for himself, the experiment is off course.

Just last July, the President told Congress that if his program was adopted, real GNP would grow by 2.5 percent in 1981—measured fourth quarter 1980 to fourth quarter 1981. According to the latest figures from the Commerce Department, real GNP grew by only 0.7 percent in 1981. The administration estimated that inflation would fall to 8.6 percent in 1981 and the unemployment rate would peak at 7.7 percent. The inflation rate for 1981 was 9.6 percent. The unemployment rate reached 8.9 percent in December and most economists predict that it will reach 10 percent in the next few months.

The President has also failed to fulfill his promise to slow the growth of Federal Government spending. In his state of the Union address, the President said that the administration's program "calls for a reduction in the rate of increase in Government spending, and already that rate has been cut nearly in half." The facts are that the program has merely shifted the growth of spending to military spending and interest payment on the national debt; the program has not cut spending.

Spending this year is growing at 12 percent, slightly higher than its average rate of growth from 1971 through 1981. Furthermore, spending will be 24 percent of GNP this year, an all-time record except for World War II, and up from 23 percent last year. In addition, this year's deficit is projected to be more than 3.5 percent of GNP up from 2 percent of GNP last year.

The President attempted to defend this ballooning deficit by stating that inflation was brought down faster than expected and as a result has "deprived Government of those hidden revenues that occur when inflation pushes people into higher income tax brackets." However, in July, the President estimated that the Consumer Price Index (CPI) would slow to 8.6 percent in 1981, instead in 1981 the CPI was at 9.6 percent—higher, not lower, than the President expected. Thus the slowdown in inflation cannot be blamed for the largest deficit in the history of our country.

In 1982, the Federal deficit will be closer to $109 billion instead of the President's promised $42 billion level. In 1983, the deficit could climb to $155 billion. And in 1984, the deficit could reach $190 billion, far from the goal of a balanced budget. Overall, it is expected that close to $455 billion will be added to the deficit in the next 3 years—more than two and a half times the increase during the 4 years of World War II.

The national debt will be increased by approximately $2,000 for every man, woman, and child in the Nation. Our country has never had to endure deficits of this size. It must not be allowed to do so now. Large deficits force the Government to borrow money in the credit markets, which results in increased interest rates and reduces the credit available to the private sector for investment. The administration must understand that you cannot decrease revenues with a massive tax cut, increase defense spending by $69 billion, and reach a balanced budget by 1984. The President fails to acknowledge the results of his economic proposals.

In the state of the Union we did not hear mention of a balanced budget. Instead the President managed to turn the focus away from the current economic crisis by proposing yet another experiment—"New Federalism." This time the President has proposed to experiment with the basic framework of Government. The "New Federalism" is a sweeping proposal to change the current program and funding relations between Federal Government and States and localities. "New Federalism" only changes the structure of government, it does not create one new job, it does not provide incentives for stimulating economic growth, and it does not reduce the ever-growing budget deficits.

The President said that his economic program will "stimulate the economy * * * provide capital for expansion, mortgages for homebuilding and jobs for the unemployed." Since the President came into office, his programs have:

Caused a serious recession—real economic growth fell 5.2 percent last quarter;

Reduced new investment—capital goods orders fell nearly 12 percent during 1981;

Pushed homebuilding to a 35 year low;

Increased unemployment by 2 million to 9.5 million;

Increased long-term interest rates by more than 2.5 percentage points; and Increased business failures by more than 45 percent.

We have heard before that if we "do a little more" we can win the war. Now, we keep hearing how if we endure a little longer, and cut spending a little further, we will prove this economic theory a success.

Wall Street does not believe it. I do not believe it.

Someone may be seeing a light at the end of this economic tunnel, but I do not know who that person is. It has been clear to me for some time that the major thrust of this economic program is to reward the rich, while at the same time dismantling every Federal program designed to help people prosper and provide the needed infrastructure for economic growth.

This economic experiment must be stopped before more jobs are destroyed, before high interest rates choke off all investment. It is a President's responsibility to insure that his economic policies meet the needs of the Nation. President Reagan has neglected this responsibility. The President cannot ignore the state of the economy by unveiling a governmental reorganization scheme as a diversion.●

VOTING RIGHTS VIOLATION TEST: INTENT VERSUS EFFECTS

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, in extending the Voting Rights Act on October 5, 1981, by a vote of 389 to 24, the House made two basic changes in the present law. First, it was made easier for a covered jurisdiction to bail out of the preclearance provisions of section 5. Second, the test used to prove that a law violates the Voting Rights Act reverted back to what it was before the Mobile decision by the Supreme Court in 1980.

The question of the Mobile intent test versus effects of a change in election laws is critical. The alternative to the House-passed bill—a straight 10-year extension—would incorporate the intent test of the Mobile case.

Frank R. Parker, director of the voting rights project of the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights under Law on the op-ed page of the New York Times on February 5, 1982, contributed a thoughtful piece on the difficulties with the intent test. I commend his statement to my colleagues in both the House and Senate.

SAVING VOTING RIGHTS

(By Frank R. Parker)

WASHINGTON.—The Administration opposes the pending amendment to the Voting Rights Act that would prohibit any law "which results in a denial or abridgement" of the right to vote on account of race or language. Senators who oppose the amendment argue that it is possible to prove intent to discriminate and also that the proposed amendment will result in proportional representation by race. The extreme difficulties of proving discriminatory intent and the plain words of the bill itself clearly refute both arguments.

The small group of senators who oppose the amendment base their arguments on the new "intent" requirement established by the United States Supreme Court in its City of Mobile v. Bolden decision in 1980—a ruling that drastically altered the standard under which black and Hispanic voters had been successful in overcoming racial gerrymandering of district lines, discriminatory at-large elections, and other electoral barriers. Now, minority voters have to prove that a voting law they are challenging was adopted or retained with conscious intent to discriminate.

Proving discriminatory intent ultimately requires a determination of what was in the minds of legislators who enacted or retained the voting law being challenged. And this difficult psychoanalytic task is fraught with sometimes unsuperable practical and legal barriers.

Not only were many discriminatory voting practices adopted years ago by legislators who are now dead, but the best sources of information about their discriminatory motives also are cut off by restrictive legal rules barring full investigation of lawmakers' purposes.

Testimony of legislators who authored or supported discriminatory legislation is generally prohibited by "legislative privilege," which prevents minority voters from cross-examining legislators. And recently, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers the Southern states, where most of these cases originate, ruled that the motivation for adopting allegedly discriminatory voting schemes by popular referendum is totally immune from judicial scrutiny.

In the absence of a "smoking gun," victims of discriminatory laws must resort to evidence producing what courts and legal scholars have called "inferences," "suspicions," and "likelihoods" of discriminatory intent. Here, judges frequently disagree, sometimes strenuously, on what constitutes sufficient proof. The nine Justices of the Supreme Court in the mobile case itself were unable to agree on the proper legal standard for proving discriminatory intent. And if a majority of the Justices of the Supreme Court can't agree on how discriminatory intent can be proved, how does anyone know what is required? As Justice Byron R. White put it in his dissenting opinion, the Supreme Court's decision "leaves the courts below adrift on uncharted seas with respect to how to proceed."

According to the House Judiciary Committee report stating the purpose of the bill, the version of this amendment passed by the House last fall resolved the confusion growing out of the Mobile case and restored the approach followed in prior court cases that focused on the results of a challenged voting law instead of the motivation behind it.

According to those decisions, merely a lack of minority officeholders or the failure of minority candidates to win office would not be sufficient for the challenged law to be struck down. Instead, as the Supreme Court indicated in a 1973 Texas case—White v. Regester—minority voters would have to cite objective evidence such as a past history of discrimination, unfair election rules, or a pattern of racial block voting to prove that the challenged practice denied them an equal opportunity "to participate in the political processes." These prior decisions make it clear that "an aggregate" of discriminatory results must be shown for minority voters to prevail.

Any fear that the proposed amendment would require "proportional representation" or racial quotas is allayed by the plain words of the bill itself: "The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section."

In November, when President Reagan supported an extension of the Voting Rights Act, he affirmed: "The right to vote is the crown jewel of American liberties, and we will not see its luster diminished." The special imposition on minorities of the burdensome and difficult "intent" requirement tarnishes this crown jewel, and should be eliminated.●

PARENTAL NOTIFICATION—SQUEALING ON TEENAGERS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the administration is planning to propose a regulation to require family planning agencies receiving Federal support to notify the parents of teenagers under 18 who receive prescription drugs or devices for birth control and venereal disease. I believe a regulation of this kind would not be in the best interests of teenagers, their families, or the country. It would not stop sexual activity among teenagers but it would significantly increase unwanted pregnancies, abortions and VD among teenagers. No government policies should promote these.

I recently wrote to HHS Secretary Schweiker to protest this kind of regulation. I would like to share this letter with my colleagues.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 22, 1982.

Hon. RICHARD SCHWEIKER,
Secretary, Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am extremely disturbed about the proposed regulations now under consideration by the Office of Management and Budget and the Department of Health and Human Services which would require family planning agencies receiving federal funds to notify the parents of minors under 18 who receive prescription drugs or devices relating to contraception or venereal disease.

These regulations requiring notification are not only inconsistent with the expressed intent of Congress but they would have an extremely negative impact on teenagers, their families and the country. In fact, they could have exactly the opposite effect of that desired by proponents of parental notification.

Policies which prevent confidentiality will not deter sexual activity among teenagers, but they could deter teenagers from seeking the information or services they need. If these regulations are adopted, teenagers will be hesitant to contact the appropriate agency even if they suspect they've been exposed to a venereal disease. If this happens, I fear we will see an increase of unprecedented proportion in untreated V.D. among teenagers across the country. In addition, requiring parental notification by family planning agencies will result in many teenagers resorting to less effective non-prescription contraceptives or unprotected intercourse, significantly increasing the number of high-risk teenage pregnancies or abortions. No government policy should promote either of these results!

While I believe young people should be encouraged to communicate with their families about any care they are receiving, I don't see how requiring notification will strengthen family communication. In many instances, it could drive a wedge between teenagers and their parents.

Finally, Mr. Secretary, these proposed regulations contradict established health policy. All states have adopted laws that permit minors to obtain V.D. treatment on their own consent. Thirty states authorize minors to give consent to family planning services. I don't believe it is appropriate for the federal government to establish a conflicting policy and impose that policy on the states.

I hope you will reconsider the many adverse effects of requiring parental notification and will continue to encourage, but not require, family involvement.

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. OTTINGER,
Member of Congress.

In addition, on Friday, February 5, the New York Times published an editorial on parental notification that I believe is right on target.

Thoughtful parents have to be saddened by the precocity of adolescent sexual behavior. But what is that sadness compared with the tragedy of a child propelled to childbirth or abortion by Government interference in the counseling program?

The text of the editorial follows:

SQUEALING ON TEENAGERS

Sex sells jeans, perfume and cars. Conversely, jeans, perfume and cars sell sex. The audience at a raunchy revue is not applauding the costumes, nor do wine and cheese attract the customers to the kind of party that sells "marital aids" instead of Tupperware. The pursuit of a "good sex life" is sanctioned not only by millions of Americans but by the I.R.S., which allows a tax deduction for sex counseling. This is life in the United States.

Now imagine a place in which no one under 18 has ever seen television, movies, newspapers or magazines . . . in which all parents are married, in perpetuity and in bliss . . . in which sexual feelings emerge simultaneously with the taking of wedding vows. This is not life in the United States. Yet much of the nation prefers to treat children as if it were.

The need for that pretense is understandable. Most parents hope their children will delay sexual activity until maturity; many are shattered when they discover otherwise. But 350,000 teen-agers will bear children out of wedlock in 1982. Several hundred thousand others will undergo abortions. Some of these are poor, others affluent; all have been raised in a time of sexual revolution.

Since there is no reason to think this revolution will ever be wholly reversed, there is a national responsibility to insure that it does not consume children and adolescents.

Ideally, teen-agers who want contraceptive advice will feel free to talk to their parents first. But often such discussion is painful, indeed impossible. Family planning services like Planned Parenthood provide a neutral ground in which to talk, and to listen. In 1979, the Alan Guttmacher Institute estimates, such services averted some 400,000 unintended teen-age pregnancies. They might have averted more if their clients had come sooner: most had been sexually active for a year.

Now the Reagan Administration is considering a law to force subsidized family planning agencies to notify the parents whenever teen-agers under 18 seek contraceptive drugs and devices. Parents, they say, should be informed about prescriptions that affect their children's health.

There is no contraceptive, however, that affects an adolescent's health as adversely as pregnancy. Teen-agers are five times as apt to die of pregnancy-related causes as from using the pill. (They are also at the least risk of any age group from the pill.) Nor is there anything more likely to drive teen-agers away from a family-planning agency than the knowledge that it is required to squeal on them.

Most agencies do in fact encourage youngsters to tell their families about the clinic visits, and a majority of the teen-agers do so. But a recent study by the Guttmacher Institute found that a fourth of them would stop applying for prescription contraceptives if their parents had to be notified. Only 2 percent said they would stop sexual activity.

Thoughtful parents have to be saddened by the precocity of adolescent sexual behavior. But what is that sadness compared with the tragedy of a child propelled to childbirth or abortion by Government interference in the counseling program? Weigh these alternatives and see why the best, most loving action a parent can take is to tell the Government to butt out.

I sincerely hope that the Department of Health and Human Services will rethink the drastic consequences of requiring parental notification and drop its plans to propose this regulation.●

ACTIONS PROTESTED

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, Mr. George W. Tucker, of Mayfield, Ky., has written me a very thoughtful letter concerning actions proposed by the Reagan administration which will affect Mr. Tucker's upcoming retirement. I believe Mr. Tucker's letter is one which should be shared with my colleagues and I wish to do so at this time. The letter follows:

Rep. CARROLL HUBBARD, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am a career Postal employee with 29 years of service, including 4 years military duty and I am a few months away from optional retirement. As such, I must protest some actions proposed by the Reagan Administration.

The first of these is the reduction of Health Plan benefits and the substantial increase in premiums. The Office of Personnel Management has directed all Federal Health Benefit Plans to include, in 1982, a new $200 "deductible", and 75 percent "coinsurance" as well as to make other reductions. This would work a severe hardship on retirees who need medical insurance most as well as regular employees who would see payroll deductions increase and benefits shrink.

The second item is the proposed indexing of retiree cost-of-living adjustments to federal wage increases, which have been capped at 4.8 percent. The retiree suffers an average loss of $595 in COLA per year, already, because of the reduction of the twice a year adjustment and this will further reduce benefits.

The above proposals would more than offset the small gains we received from the income tax cut. I am in favor of a balanced budget and I do not favor reduced military spending, but I do take a hard look at the 22 million people drawing food stamps plus the career drones who should be self-supporting instead of depending on welfare. I feel the task of Congress is to aid the self-reliant, not those who make a career of dependency.

Sincerely,

GEORGE W. TUCKER.●

ASSASSINATION OF THE TURKISH CONSUL GENERAL IN LOS ANGELES

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, on July 10, 1981, I denounced the senseless killings of the diplomats of our trusted NATO ally, the Republic of Turkey, by Armenian terrorist groups in Europe and Australia.

Unfortunately, on January 28, 1982, Armenian terrorism claimed its first victim since 1973 in the United States, again in Los Angeles and again the Turkish Consul General, Mr. Kemal Arikan. This is a very disturbing development indeed because it brings international terrorism back to our shores and while we know that the overwhelming majority of the Armenian community in the United States join me in condemning their activities, the terrorists do find supporters in the United States to perform their dastardly deeds.

The activities of these two groups include over 50 bombings, 21 assassinations in Western countries, particularly those of Western Europe, and lately, also in Australia. The two groups are not synonymous in their ideology, the ASALA being completely Marxist, trained by the pro-Moscow faction of the PLO under George Habash and virulently anti-American, while the Justice Commandos are nationalist fanatics, but all of them share their participation in the international terrorist movements.

We all sympathize with the tragic plight of the ancestors of these terrorists during the intercommunal fighting of the Ottoman Empire during World War I, but this does not justify at all the killing of the diplomats of the Turkish Republic which did not even exist in 1915–16 when the killings occurred.●

EL SALVADOR IS VITAL TO SECURITY

HON. MARJORIE S. HOLT

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, let us be clear about what is happening in El Salvador. It is not a revolution for freedom, democracy, or economic development and opportunity.

The leading cadres of that revolution know exactly what they want, and it is not consistent with anything that decent people would desire for that poor country.

If the revolutionaries win, we will see the rapid development of El Salvador into a Cuban-style police state, an extension of Soviet power, a new staging area for further Soviet advances on the southern flank of the United States. If you have any doubts about what I say, then I invite your attention to what has happened in Nicaragua, which has become a Soviet-Cuban base and arms depot for Marxist guerrilla wars against other Central American governments.

The Marxist revolution in El Salvador is armed by the Soviet Union and Cuba through Nicaragua.

I am deeply concerned and distressed when I read accounts that military excesses have harmed noncombat- ants in the Salvadoran civil war, but I would remind you that the worst oppressors of human rights on this planet are the Marxist totalitarians.

President Napoleon Duarte has undertaken a land-reform program which by all accounts is achieving some success in a country torn by civil war.

He has scheduled March elections for a consistent assembly and invited the radical opposition to drop their arms and participate.

Does the Communist opposition want an election? The answer is "No." If they won control of El Salvador, would there ever be an election? Again the answer is "No." Would there be an infusion of Cuban advisers and technicians to establish the apparatus of the police state? Yes, indeed. Would a Communist regime bring freedom and economic opportunity to the people? Of course not.

Look at Nicaragua, or Cuba. Examine Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia. Think even about Eastern Europe or the Soviet Union itself. Is there a Communist regime anywhere that respects human rights, offers anything but common poverty to its regimented masses, or would risk a free election?

I am telling this Congress that we should not, must not, tolerate a totalitarian future for the suffering people of El Salvador or any other Latin American country. These people are our neighbors who are struggling to arise from centuries of oppression, and it would be a ghastly event if they fall to the modern oppression known as communism.

President Napoleon Duarte is not a rightwing dictator. He is a Christian Democrat determined to bring democracy and economic reform to his country. In the past, he suffered imprisonment and exile for his political views. His government and even his life are at risk as he tries to navigate his country between radicalism of left and right, while a brutal civil war rages in the countryside.

The worst thing we could do would be to withdraw our support from President Napoleon Duarte, stop sending arms and economic aid to his government, and leave him and his government to destruction by the Marxist guerrilla forces.

If Central America is to have any hope for democracy and economic opportunity that would lift the lives of the people, that hope lies in leaders with the character and principles of President Napoleon Duarte.

If we are to prevent Soviet-Cuban advances in Central America from ultimately becoming a threat to our national security, then we must do what is necessary to help our allies stop the Marxist forces.

There is a Soviet-Cuban design for all of Central America. Will El Salvador be the next to fall, followed by Honduras, Costa Rica, and Guatemala, then on to the Panama Canal and the oil fields of southern Mexico?

Have you considered the prospect of armed terrorist forces moving across our own southern border in the years ahead?

That is a possible consequence of developments today in Central America. The civil war in El Salvador cannot be isolated from concern for our own national security.●

JONES' BRILLIANT SPEECH

HON. GILLIS W. LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee (Mr. JONES) spoke to the National Strategy Council of the Democratic Party.

Mr. JONES' speech was a brilliant analysis of our Nation's ecomomic and budget problems. He points, with particular concern, to the spiraling deficits that have resulted from the administration's supply side economic policies.

Our economy, according to Chairman JONES:

Will respond to a balanced fiscal policy that reduces spending wherever that can be done—including military budgets—and restores spending wherever that should be done—including job training, research, and education. It will respond to a tax policy that encourages savings and investment and enterprise but not to a tax policy which creates deficits of $100 billion to $150 billion.

Chairman JONES called on congressional Republicans to work with the Democrats "to develop an economic policy to meet the needs of our people," but warned that we Democrats, "will not settle, to use Franklin Roosevelt's words, for a Government frozen in the ice of its own indifference."

Mr. Speaker, I believe all of our colleagues would benefit from reading Chairman JONES' speech, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

ADDRESS OF JAMES R. JONES

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Democratic Strategy Council:

For days now I have been studying the State of the Union message drafted by the Reagan Administration and so beautifully performed by the President himself.

I sought to understand the riddle of a State of the Union message that didn't mention the state of the union.

This morning I discovered it. It was rereading the speech while shaving when I noticed that it could be read reversed in the mirror. Not only had I broken the White House code, but I had also learned the identity of the writer.

I will share the secrets with you here today.

This is what the speech really said:

'Twas brillig, and the unemployed
Did gyre and gimble in the wade;
All mimsy were the working poor,
And the elderly outgrabe,
Beware the Press Conference, my son!
The jaws that bite, the facts that hitch,
Beware the interest rates, and shun
The frumious deficits.

There was more, but now that it was clear that Lewis Carroll was writing for the White House, it was imperative that I talk to Dave Stockman.

I reached an OMB spokesman who said that David had disappeared down a rabbit hole some months ago and had seldom been seen since. I asked the spokesman about Lewis Carroll's status, and he said the White House had been deeply impressed with the writer's technique and had used him on a free-lance basis. He said they had wanted to hire Carroll full time but were shocked by the outcome of his lie detector test.

Lewis Carroll, the OMB spokesman said, wrote Alice in Wonderland and Through the Looking Glass—but Carroll did not believe them. He was, therefore, unsuitable to work in a supply side White House and could not have been confirmed by the Senate.

To be serious, there was one part of the State of the Union address that did make great sense. It was spoken by Abraham Lincoln one hundred and twenty years ago. Lincoln said, "We cannot escape history. We of this Congress and this Administration will be remembered in spite of ourselves."

There can be no better advice for the Democratic Party, the Republican Party or the President of the United States than those stark words. We cannot escape history.

And history tells us it is our duty to work for a healthy economy that will grow, provide jobs and progress for the American people . . . an economy motivated by research, education, training, transportation, creativity and inventiveness—not an economy skewered by record unemployment, $100 billion deficits, and stifling interest rates.

It is our duty to move our Nation away from class and racial division—not to separate the rich from the rest, and black from white; not to turn back years of progress toward a fair and equal society.

It is our duty to have a strong national defense, trained, equipped, ready and able—not a privileged military establishment with expensive new weapons systems that are outdated before they are delivered, not a military overarmed with complexity and undermanned by only the poorest elements of our society.

It is our duty to seek a mutual reduction of the nuclear weapons which threaten to destroy us all. When Admiral Rickover, the man who built our missile launching submarine force, warns that "probably we will destroy ourselves", it is time for all Americans to understand the dangers of this arms race.

It is our duty to help the helpless and make certain that our old and our young have a decent life and the opportunity for a better future—not a program in which the old and the weak lose medical assistance, the working poor are forced back to the dole, and the unemployed have no access to training.

Today, we are coming off a year in which Reaganomics triumphed completely. We are unable to match the vast sums of money the Republicans and their New Right attack groups can raise. We are just beginning to understand their sophisticated campaign techniques and I pray we never catch up in their use of distortion and vicious tactics. A few months ago we Democrats were a gloomy lot.

But not today. We won Virginia where we haven't won for years. And the trends in the polls are clear. If next fall's election were held today we would win a sweeping congressional victory.

The Republicans, who could have become the majority party by proposing a fair and balanced program, instead did what they have done throughout our Nation's history. As they have from the time of the Federalists in 1796 to the New Right of 1982, they choose to be the party of the rich, the party of isolation and narrowness, the party of economic class division, the party of suppression of individual freedom.

There was one great Republican exception—Abraham Lincoln. He spoke for the common man and for freedom, for national unity and national reconciliation. He spoke with honesty. And he spoke with genuine love and understanding of the working American.

Today we hear rhetoric which sounds glorious—and which the American people are desperate to believe. But I fear that the truth of today is unemployment, bankruptcy, high interest rates, staggering deficits, declining cities, regional, economic and racial division.

Somewhere in the 1970's we Democrats lost contact with the backbone of our party—the broad middle of America. We temporarily became the stomping ground of one issue factions unwilling to compromise or share goals. People came to believe that we were financially irresponsible and that we did not represent the hard-working American.

We should not forget that last year we Democrats began to forge a new future during the congressional budget debates. We did offer a reasoned, fair and fiscally responsible alternative . . . an alternative that said investment in human beings was just as important to improved productivity as investment in capital assets.

We offered an alternative that preserved our commitment to education, decent nutrition, training for jobs and technological research—while at the same time actually reducing the deficits to manageable levels, providing fairer tax relief, and lowering interest rates so that our economy could truly start moving again.

Our alternative recognized that we cannot solve the malignancy of social injustice and disadvantage unless we solve the mystery of the economy at large.

It is fair to say that had our alternative passed there would be a million more people working today rather than languishing in unemployment lines . . . there would be a fiscal and monetary climate in which capital investment would be increasing rather than staying stagnant, deficits would be below $50 billion rather than in excess of $100 billion, the 1,500 school lunch programs would not have closed, and a major Wall Street firm would not be giving a depression scenario—a 30 percent chance this year as was reported this week. And when E. F. Hutton speaks, we should be listening.

But as we grappled with a reasoned response tailored to our nation's need, the New Right stormed into town and with dazzling sales techniques convinced the American people that our very real problems were the fault of poor people taking government aid and that if that were slashed and rich people were given massive tax cuts, all would be well.

It was what people wanted to hear and wanted to believe. It is what people still want to believe. Somehow Joe American had been convinced that if he would hand over his life savings to this new friend and wait on the street corner with a bag, the friend would duck into the bank and return with a lot of extra money to drop in the bag.

Joe American is standing out on the corner right now with the bag in his hand and if you tell him that the chances of his friend coming back with his savings—not to mention the extra money—are dropping every minute, he doesn't want to hear that. He still needs to believe that his new friend is going to come through for him.

Maybe that will happen and old Joe will have pulled a coup and gotten something that he didn't have to work for.

But if that charming new friend doesn't return, Joe American is going to need his old friends more than ever before. And his old friends are going to have to help him like never before.

We're going to have to help him get back on his feet and we're going to have to help him get over the shock and disappointment. It won't be easy for us or for him. We're going to have to tell him the truth and we're all going to have to work hard. We'll have to face problems, not blame them on someone else.

We are going to have to convince the American people that there is no free lunch for the poor or the middle class or even the rich in the long run. Our economy is not going to respond to the nostrums of supply-side cultists.

It will respond to a balanced fiscal policy that reduces spending wherever that can be done—including military budgets—and restores spending wherever that should be done—including job training and research and education. It will respond to a tax policy that encourages savings and investment and enterprise but not to a tax policy which creates deficits of $100 billion to $150 billion.

Now we have the President and his strongest supply-side ally, Rep. Jack Kemp, saying they do not believe their own deficit numbers. We have a Treasury Secretary who calls outyear deficits "literally meaningless".

A policy like the one in place under the Republicans can lead only to recession and unemployment, perhaps followed by slight recovery and high interest rates followed by more recession and unemployment.

Just as our economy is not going to respond to the siren song of supply-side sorcery, it will not respond to misguided monetarism. I doubt that you will find many Americans, outside the Administration and a certain group of economists, who believe that interest rates don't matter, just the money supply. Interest rates do matter. And it is essential to the well being of our people that we return to fiscal and monetary policies which mesh instead of clash.

It is that clash and confusion of policies that is causing the failure of the Republican economic program and is causing so much damage to the state of the union.

And what is the state of our union today?

Unemployment is now at its highest level since the Depression and even the Secretary of the Treasury admits that it will go above ten percent.

Net income from farming this year is expected to be at the lowest level since the 1930-1934 period. As some of you will recall, those were not great years. Our farmers are being crushed by high interest rates and low prices as Reaganomics ruins our export markets.

There are more jobless Americans today than at any time since 1939.

Real interest rates are now higher than they have been at any time since 1932.

Last year saw the lowest number of housing starts since 1940.

U.S. auto production is the lowest it has been in 35 years.

And business failures are the highest since 1961.

As for deficits, there is nothing in America's past to which we can compare the coming deficits. Under existing policies—and primarily because of the Kemp-Roth tax program—the deficit will be $109 billion in 1982; at least that much in 1983; $189 billion in 1984; $214 billion in 1985; and $240 billion in 1986. That would be a cumulative five-year total of nearly $900 billion.

Perhaps the theme of the November campaign will be, "Are you better off today than you were in the Depression?"

In the days ahead, we Democrats are going to develop an economic policy to meet the needs of our people. We will seek to work with the President and with Congressional Republicans as we develop that policy, but we will not settle, to use Franklin Delano Roosevelt's words, for "a government frozen in the ice of its own indifference".

The problems are severe and the solutions politically difficult—so difficult that they cannot be resolved on a partisan basis. We would welcome any sign that the White House is willing to work together toward solutions. But I must add that as yet we have seen no such sign. instead, we heard a State of the Union address described by one of my Republican colleagues as "nice but basically irrelevant."

If on Monday the Administration presents a budget based like last year's on smoke and mirrors, we will know that our economy likely will face record unemployment, record business failures and record interest rates.

There are signs that Congressmen in both parties are recognizing that the Nation is in serious trouble and that partisanship is not the answer. There is a chance that if the economy slips much further and the White House fails to respond, Congressional Republicans and Democrats will band together to develop solutions.

But there is also a chance that the Congress will deadlock, the Republicans sticking behind a set of failing policies, and the Democrats seeking a new path.

As Democrats we must be true to our past and true to the American people. We must seek the best answers that can be found. We must put our Nation first, for we are the party of all Americans caring for all Americans. We are a party that is against division by class, race or region.

We are not anti-government for we know good government is essential, that it provides for a strong defense and the framework for economic advance.

We know that it is not honest to tell the American people that "government is the problem."

Bad government, yes. Wasteful government, yes. But not government. Government is as good or bad, wasteful or efficient as Americans let it be.

The 1960's and 1970's are gone. So are the 1940's and 1950's and we pray the 1930's will not return. What of the 1980's?

It must not be a time for greed, but a time for sharing of burdens and rewards.

That's the American spirit—a mixture of ambition and risk and caring about the other fellow. The Democratic tomorrow is a time of maximum freedom and maximum opportunity for all Americans.

We must have balanced domestic, fiscal and monetary policies which create growth, explore new technology, foster new jobs for those who can work, and protect those who are helpless. We must have policies based on human dignity and equal rights for all.

We must have a government which is fair, rational and honest, which listens to the people it serves and tells the truth.

We must have a foreign policy both tough and good. We will protect ourselves and our interests but we must recognize that our interest is best served by a world of free and democratic nations.

Those are the challenges which face us today—the challenge of pulling our party back to its past and into its future.●

TAX LEASING LAW HURTS SMALL BUSINESS

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, on several occasions I have informed this body of my concerns regarding the so-called safe-harbor leasing provisions of the tax law we passed last year. Aside from noting the enormous revenue losses caused by this new law, I have attempted to call attention to the fact that the leasing provision confers disproportionate tax advantages upon the largest corporations in the Nation while being of little or no value to most small businesses.

An article in this morning's Wall Street Journal underscores this point. Journal reporter Sanford L. Jacobs, begins his "Small Business" column this week by saying:

Small businesses don't get anywhere near the tax benefits big companies receive from the safe-harbor leasing provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

Mr. Speaker, we are about to begin another long debate over the Federal budget and our national economic policies. With this in mind, I believe it would be useful for our colleagues to read what Mr. Jacobs has to say about leasing provisions in today's Wall Street Journal. At this point in the RECORD, I wish to insert the full text of the article.

LEASING BREAKS LIMITED FOR SMALL FIRMS

Small businesses don't get anywhere near the tax benefits big companies receive from the safe-harbor leasing provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. Most publicly held corporations are likely to become free of paying corporate income tax because of the new law, tax practitioners say.

"They left it wide open for the Occidental Petroleums and IBMs, but they effectively knocked the little guy out of it," says Steven Holub, director of tax services at the accounting firm of Laventhol & Horwath.

The new law recognizes as leases for tax purposes arrangements that wouldn't have qualified under prior law. What used to be considered "sham leases" by the Internal Revenue Service, and thus ineligible for leasing tax benefits, qualify under the new rules. However, other tax provisions that apply to closely held corporations—those in which five or fewer shareholders own 50 percent or more of the stock—individuals and partnerships, greatly limit the benefits for small companies.

For companies that qualify, the benefits are substantial. Seymour Israel, a New York lawyer specializing in tax leases, offers an example. A big company pays $150,000 in the first year to buy $1 million of equipment from a second company. The equipment is leased back to the second company which is still owed a balance of $850,000 on the purchase price.

Under terms of the lease, the user's rent matches the owner's debt payments, so no additional money changes hands beyond the original $150,000. But the owning corporation avoids $465,000 in income tax in the first five years, more than three times the $150,000 it paid to get into the deal.

Few small companies can work such an arrangement. But they can get some benefits from the new law, Mr. Israel says. Their leases will involve bigger cash outlays and financing from a bank or finance company.

Mr. Israel provides an example from an actual deal involving a $1 million computer. A small company laid out $260,000 in cash to buy the computer for leasing. It owes the balance to a finance company and at the end of the lease will be $127,000 ahead on the deal without counting the value of the computer at that time. That's much less than the big company gained in the previous example.

"This puts many small companies at a competitive disadvantage with publicly held companies," Mr. Israel says, "Over time that disadvantage can be backbreaking."—SANFORD L. JACOBS.●

LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE ROYALTY COLLECTION PROCESS

HON. JIM SANTINI

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation to improve the royalty collection process through which the United States collects royalty payments for oil and gas production on Federal lands. In 1982, these payments are estimated to be $500 million. Over the past year I have been actively engaged in examining the collection process which is managed by the U.S. Geological Survey. The system is in unbelievable disarray. In joint public hearings with my colleague, Mr. MARKEY, it has been reported by authoritative witnesses that the USGS has, for at least two decades, failed to collect all the royalties to which the Federal Government, the States, and many Indian tribes are entitled. Further, there is very little in indication we can expect any immediate improvement. Many of the States and Indian tribes indicated they could do a better job collecting royalties themselves.

Next to the IRS, no other Federal agency collects the amount of money the USGS is responsible for collecting. By 1990, it is estimated conservatively that U.S. royalties will be over $14 billion annually. Losses are generally estimated at 10 percent. The General Accounting Office, the Inspector General's Office, and others have been issuing a stream of reports detailing the shortcomings of this collection process for over 20 years. Without rehashing all of these shortcomings and commenting on the many recommendations that have come before our subcommittees, it has become apparent that several problems are salient.

First the system clearly lacks the basic means to determine in all cases who owes money to the Government, how much they owe, or whether or not they have paid what they owe.

Second, poor management practices within the Geological Survey have made it difficult to develop and enforce rules necessary to insure the security and integrity of the oil production system itself, or to insure the gathering of the data necessary for accurate establishment of royalties owed.

Third, efforts to reform the royalty system do not appear to be giving adequate priority to some of the most critical elements necessary for an immediate improvement of collection and verification capabilities.

The legislation I am introducing with Mr. Markey today is a necessary step toward correcting these problems. It will require the same sound management practices within the Government that we demand of our business community.

First, this legislation will incorporate within USGS standard financial and accounting safeguards of personal liability, bonding and independent CPA audits. These requirements are met by many of the States which testified before our subcommittees, and it is time that the Federal Government starts to meet them as well.

Second, those States which have the capability will be given the authority, subject to Federal audit guidelines, to collect these royalties which are due, and then to remit to the U.S. Treasury the 50 percent—10 percent in the case of Alaska—due to the Federal Government. Several States have indicated that they could, and would like to, do a better job than USGS in collecting royalties. I strongly believe the States should be given the opportunity to manage these programs, since they have a major impact on State revenues.

Third, it will grant USGS the authority to designate a principal lessee for each lease, whose responsibility it will be to report and make royalty payments on its particular lease. This will eliminate the antitrust problems USGS stated prevented such useful simplification of its system.

Fourth, it will give Indians or their designated agents full access to USGS records relative to production or sales from their respective leases. Such access has been difficult for them to obtain in the past, even though they are the actual owners of the land being leased in these cases.

Fifth, it will grant the Department of the Interior explicit authority to track oil and gas produced from Federal properties to refineries in order to insure accurate reporting and payment of royalties by producers. Once again, we heard testimony that this was already required, and very effective, in some of the States with respect to their own oil and gas leases.

Finally, it will establish reasonable civil penalties for compliance violations without forcing USGS to shut in a lease to insure compliance by the lessee.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot tolerate poor management practices in the Federal Government. It fosters abuse and fraud. In today's environmemt we should not, and indeed we cannot afford to, eliminate basic social programs while we fail to collect moneys rightly owed the public whose interest we represent. I invite my colleagues to join with us in this war of fiscal mismanagement by cosponsoring this legislation.●

"THE AGONIES OF IRELAND"

HON. THOMAS S. FOLEY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to make available to our colleagues in the House a series of articles, "The Agonies of Ireland", that appeared at the end of last year in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

I believe your letter to Mr. Michael Pakenham, associate editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer, the text of which follows, clearly states why these articles are such essential reading for all Americans who seek to understand the problem in Northern Ireland and the urgency behind the search for its resolution. I also urge my colleagues to share them with their constituents who are so deeply troubled by the ongoing tragedy in Northern Ireland.

All of us share the hope of so many Americans that we will soon see that advent of a true peace and a permanent ending to the violence that has taken so many innocent lives and brought about such great destruction.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 29, 1981.

Mr. MICHAEL PAKENHAM,
Associate Editor, The Philadelphia Inquirer, 400 N. Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR MR. PAKENHAM: Thank you for sending me your "agonies" series on Ireland. I agree with your point that the only alternative is to identify with the humanity of Northern Ireland, and clearly that will only occur when Americans heed your admonition "to understand the problem and its importance."

As you know I and a number of my colleagues have been laboring against the "simplistic" view for years. We were making considerable progress until the Hunger Strike. American television gave the IRA a media coup of sorts during that terrible protest. But we have not given up.

I hope your paper reprints the series in pamphlet form because we could use it. I also intend to see that it gets into the Congressional Record. Such knowledgeable and sensible writing on the Northern Ireland problem is rare in the United States. You and The Philadelphia Inquirer have made a substantial contribution to American awareness of the true nature and character of the problem of Northern Ireland.

With warm regards,

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker.

THE AGONIES OF IRELAND: A TEST OF CIVILIZATION

What is the island of Ireland to America? A shining emerald of romanticized nostalgia? Or an unyielding, bottomless bog to be fled, which for centuries was fought with sweat, tears and hunger? A womb forever to be yearned for, or a cruel poverty forever to escape? A magic, carefree, evergreen island enchanted by elves and songs sung by voices as clear and lambent as Waterford crystal? A source of passionately loyal affection or an agonizing reminder of blinding, unresolved rage?

Is Ireland rightly a single, emerging country, still engaged in an unfulfilled revolution of national independence —or two separate countries, both post-revolutionary, uncomfortably pluralistic societies bypassed by the industrial revolution and now turbulently seeking senses of identity and purpose without the consoling benefit of instructive models?

It is all those things. It is—also—something more, and something else.

Somewhat more than 2,100 Irish and British men, women and children have died violently in the last 12 years of brutal, doleful "Troubles." It is not irresponsible—or irrational—to fear that if worse came to worst, 10 times that number, or 20 or more times, could die in a wildfire civil war.

Ireland's gifts beyond its shores are beyond counting. The impact and influence of Irish men and women endure in every corner of the Western world. Irish names and accomplishments are imprinted upon the politics, culture, commerce, literature, music, art and legends of much of Latin America, France, Canada, Australia, Spain, Portugal and—more than any of these—England.

All those countries combined, however, do not owe to Ireland as much of their vitality as does the United States. The Irish-American heritage is greater, if not in absolute numbers then almost certainly in loyal affection, than any other contributor to the Melting Pot.

Conservatively estimated, 20 million or almost one-tenth of all Americans trace their origins to Ireland. The preponderance of the earliest Americans to come from Ireland were Protestants from the six counties that now constitute Northern Ireland, many of Scottish or English origins generations before—but Irish no less. Many of those settlers assimilated and lost their sense of origins; thus the true number of Americans of Irish descent may well be twice 20 million, or more. Four of the 39 signers of the Constitution were of Irish birth, and nine others of Irish ancestry. At least 15 of America's 39 presidents have been of predominantly Irish derivation.

The official, if obviously not totally reliable, statistics of the Immigration and Naturalization Service begin with the year 1820. Since then, Ireland, north and south, has sent to America 4.7 million people—a greater number than any other country except Germany (7 million), Italy (5.3 million) and, by a thin margin, Britain, not including Northern Ireland, (4.9 million).

There is deep reason, then, that Irish woes are American woes as well. Those woes today are at a critical point. They are as intense, in their rage and violence, as at any point in the almost 60 years since 26 of the 32 counties of Ireland became effectively free of British rule and began to stabilize as an independent nation.

Economic stultification is a serious contributor to the agonies of Ireland, and America can help. But it is not the most difficult challenge today. What is? Most simply, the enduring nourishment of a peaceful, rational political and social order, convincingly responsive to explosively discordant constitutent elements.

What are the alternatives to that? Most obviously, continued misery and bloodshed, at present levels. That is a ghastly prospect. But it is based in genuine human fears and senses of defining identity—so defining, by many Catholics and Protestants alike, as to be worth dying, and killing, for. Thus there is today substantial danger that the present violence may develop into a full-scale civil war. The murderous status quo and that far bloodier extension are dismaying.

To progress from the present danger, and to avert a greater one, is the overriding test.

It is a tiny island, a place of grand, rich, turbulent, romantic history. Yet today it has fewer inhabitants—north and south, a total of 4.7 million—than 14 of America's 50 states, and with 32,595 square miles, is smaller than 39 of them. It is a place of tight, sharp focus of passion and conflict, of neglect and passivity, of rage and yearning. It is a source of sustenance of great human insights, of humane wisdom. Yet it is also a place of rigidity of mind, of pain and polarization and brutality.

Resolving all that is an Irish problem, above all else, and then a British problem, by action or default, a legacy of centuries of history. But finally it is a problem, a true test, of the capacity of Western civilization. For if humane reason cannot prevail on the island of Ireland, it will be forever doubtful that it can rise effectively to trying difficult challenges elsewhere.

In that test, Americans have an inescapable interest, as well as a humane imperative, whether they think of their origins and affections as Irish or British, or an amalgam, or separate from them all. How America and Americans can respond most constructively is a question—a series of intricately interrelated questions—which demands first understanding and then positive action. A series of editorials here and supportive columns on the Op-ed Page will seek to provide a basis for that understanding.

THE AGONIES OF IRELAND: A TYRANNY OF HISTORY

At every corner of the island of Ireland, history is both witness and judge, the accuser and the accused. It intrudes, first as an engaging, often lyric, counterpoint to all other subjects. Quickly then, it overpowers the initial theme—be that poetry or social welfare, horse-racing or industrial development, fables or farming, family or foreign relations, literature or liberty. On the island of Ireland, history is a tyrant.

The people of Ireland are both Catholic and Protestant, both erudite and simple, powerful and poor. All are legendarily warm, eloquent, hospitable and patient. They are talkers and listeners, people who glory in argument and in the accepting recognition of differences. That dignity of human recognition prevails—until the moment Tyrant History intrudes. At that point, old wounds are torn open, or new ones are inflicted. Passions rise, and spill over. Latent agonies are laid bare.

Left to good nature, those agonies would ease and perhaps even heal—though realistically that would take a generation or more. But, conscious of the power of invoked history, tiny handfuls of willful men and women—for reasons they passionately believe are justified—leap to exploit others susceptibilities. The result is strife and renourishment of agony.

What is that Tyrant History?

There cannot be more than a half-dozen nations or cultures on earth about the history of which so much has been written as Ireland. It is endlessly examined, and yet the tyrant still stalks the slums of Belfast and Derry, the lanes and villages of Kerry and Donegal, the prisons of Ulster and the parliaments of Dublin and London.

Ancient Hibernia, from 1500 B.C. and before, was raided, swept and settled by waves of outsiders, the most enduring colony being Celts, who invaded from the European mainland around 600 B.C. The succeeding millenium was a swirling fog of tribal conflict, which the Roman Empire found purposeless to invade.

Midway in the fifth century A.D., the enslaved captive from Roman Britain who was to become St. Patrick arrived. Gradually, conversion to Christianity began. From just before 800 A.D. until beyond 1000, waves of pagan Danes and Norsemen raided—pillaging, setting and intermarrying. Tribal and feudal conflict and conquest predominated until the late 1100s, when the exceptionally aggressive British King Henry II sponsored with papal support, English military domination.

From then through the 1500s, the English continued attempts to dominate the Gaels, or Celts, who increasingly intermarried with the invaders. English power waned and rose but was generally successful at least in major cities, and especially within the Pale, the often-shifting boundary, established by Henry II, around the area centered on Dublin.

Henry VIII, having broken from the Roman Catholic Church in the mid-1500s, became the first Protestant monarch of Ireland, and an officially ordered settlement of Irish land by English and Scots began.

How many Americans today sing songs or recite poetry—or maim and kill their neighbors—with passion whose roots are deeper than 400 years? Tonight and every night in Northern Ireland, soaring lyrics and inhuman savagery will celebrate both sides of the events of the late 1500s and the 1600s.

Immigration of Scots and English to Ireland, predating all but the very earliest European settlements in America, continued under Elizabeth I, through successive uprisings and revolts. In the early 1600s, King James I increased the flow of settlers with the "plantation" of substantial numbers of Scots in the northern province of Ulster. They had been preceded, in small numbers, for centuries; Scotland is a mere 21 miles, and visible, from Ireland.

It was those Ulster "Scotch Irish" who were the chief target of attack in the Catholic "Great Rebellion" of 1641, which precipitated the English Civil War. That was finally put down by Oliver Cromwell, who assumed control of the English government. Cromwell then ravaged Irish Catholics' properties and churches with a Puritan army flaming with zealotry.

Protestants took control of most of the land. After restoration of the English monarchy, James II, a Catholic, sought briefly to redress the Cromwellian depredations. James was driven from England amid a power struggle with complex religious overtones. In 1690, James was pursued to Ireland by William of Orange, a Protestant who—confusingly today—had the support of the pope. James's Catholic forces were defeated at the Battle of the Boyne.

The early 1700s were deceptively peaceful under Protestant dominance. In the third quarter of that century, however, conflict began to grow again, encouraged by the American and French revolutions. So did the seeds of modern Irish republicanism, the national independence movement—dramatized by establishment in Belfast in 1791 of the Society of United Irishmen by Theobold Wolfe Tone and others who were predominantly Protestants. Wolfe Tone's aspiration: "To unite the whole people of Ireland . . . to substitute the common name of Irishman in place of the denominations of Protestant, Catholic and Dissenter." Disunity made that hope illusory. The "United Irish" rebellion was crushed by English and loyalist Irish forces in 1798, but only after the loss of 30,000 lives.

The first half of the 19th century was dominated by struggles between the concept of Ireland as an integral part of the United Kingdom and that of Ireland as an unruly colony. The potato famine of 1845-50 drove more than one million of Ireland's eight million inhabitants to emigrate, the largest number to America, leaving 800,000 dead behind them. The northeast part of the island, with a grain-based food economy and predominantly Protestant—more Scots-Presbyterian than Anglican—suffered far less misery than the potato-dependent, mainly Catholic areas of the island.

Irish nationalism, increasingly a Catholic cause, grew in popular strength outside Ulster, amid bitter struggle. Home rule for Ireland, under the British crown, gained great support, though not fulfillment. Substantial land reforms were accomplished by the turn of the 20th century, through British efforts to ease the passions of nationalism.

Thwarted in close debates and maneuverings in the British Parliament, the cause of Irish home rule and thus of nationalism grew more powerful. That nurtured growth of militant separatist and unionist organizations, with unionist support concentrated in the Protestant parts of the nine counties of the province of Ulster, where Protestants felt increasingly threatened by the prospect of expropriation of property and power, or even massacre, should Catholics capture control: Huge unofficial armies grew both Catholic and Protestant.

The British government, distracted by World War I, muddled along. On Easter Monday, 1916, a rebellion began in Dublin, with declaration of an Irish Republic. In what today is recognized as gross and brutal stupidity, British forces martyred the principal leaders of that rebellion before firing squads—after they had surrendered.

After the end of World War I, a provisional Irish government began to take hold, amid a bloody guerrilla war. The War of Independence, or Anglo-Irish War, caused about 2,000 deaths, brutalized tens of thousands, but led to a treaty in 1921 by which the British government conceded virtually independent dominion status to 26 of the 32 counties.

During those events, the British government was faced with the onset of World War I and the concurrent threat of a massive civil war by a Protestant Ulster Volunteer Force of nearly 100,000 men, armed with 40,000 military rifles, vast ammunition and an incalculable armory of other weapons. London backed off its resolve to leave the entire island politically intact in its new status and excluded six counties in Ulster which had a geographically unevenly distributed two-thirds Protestant majority.

The 26 counties, called the Irish Free State, struggled through hideously bloody internal dispute over the treaty and its exclusion of the north, but the 26 counties became increasingly stable and, in 1949, the Irish parliament declared an independent republic.

Northern Ireland remained a province of the United Kingdom, largely governed by its own parliament in Belfast. The yearning for a united Ireland remained powerful in the republic and—among Catholics—in Northern Ireland. Nearly all the one million Protestants of the north continued to be implacably devoted to maintaining union with—and protection by—Britain.

Those Protestants remained insensitive to the basic rights of the almost half-million Catholics in the six counties. Nationalist extremists, designated the Irish Republican Army, waged a series of terrorist campaigns against the government. In the late 1960s, a strong Catholic civil rights movement developed, a resounding echo of the worldwide civil rights tide and student unrest and protest.

Paramilitary terrorism re-emerged from both extremes and led, in 1972, to British suspension of the repressively Protestant-dominated Northern Ireland parliament and reimposition of direct rule from London, initially at least to protect the rights of beleaguered Catholics.

There Ireland stands today. Every phrase of that tiny diagram of its history oversimplifies events which themselves alone fill volumes of history. The perspective of every phrase could be debated, and is.

To many of the island's 3.5 million Catholics, it is a simple story—one of oppression by English and Scots, of centuries of denial of cultural, territorial, religious and governmental integrity, and thus of personal dignity. To many of Northern Ireland's more than one million Protestants it is also a simple story, one of centuries of fighting off the threat of domination and religious and economic subjugation—and to many minds massacre—by a Catholic majority.

The life of every Irish man, woman and child, south and north, Catholic and Protestant, is woven into the seamless tapestry of violence and fear, of heroism and meanness, of rebellion and frustration which is Ireland's history. All hope for an enduring end to those agonies lies in conquering that Tyrant History, for peace and prosperity can be nourished only in conciliation of the past.

THE AGONIES OF IRELAND: THE REALITY OF DIFFERENCES

For the woes of Ireland today, there is blame enough to go around. Those agonies are not going to be laid to rest by any sudden act of political or economic magic.

Then what can bring relief of the drain of human energy and material resources, the violent attrition of body and spirit?

There are as many answers as there are vantage points in Ireland and beyond its shores: dozens. All prescriptions with the slightest hope of fulfillment, however, contain one common premise: Any progress must begin with a broadly shared, dispassionate acceptance of the nature of the conflicts, real and mythic.

The reality is that there are two political entities on the island of Ireland. One is the Irish Republic, with 26 counties, an independent, democratic state. The other is the Province of Northern Ireland, comprising six of the nine counties of the ancient Irish province of Ulster, occupying the northeast corner of the island. It is constitutionally a part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Its voters are represented in the Parliament in London, the oldest democratic body on earth, precisely as are the voters of Liverpool or Edinburgh. Its laws and taxes and the levels and policies of government service are set by the British Parliament.

To American eyes, or pocket calculators or geography lessons, the numbers are tiny: The island is 32,595 square miles of land, almost exactly the size of Maine (33,215 square miles), 70 percent that of Pennsylvania (45,333), less than one-eight the area of California (158,693). It is 302 miles from its northmost point to its southern reach, 171 miles from east to west. The population is 4.7 million, exactly that of the Philadelphia metropolitan area, less than half that of Pennsylvania (11.8 million).

Those numbers are astonishingly small. Yet the numbers underlying the misery that plagues the island are even smaller. The Irish Republic occupies 27,136 square miles, and Northern Ireland 5,459—a mere 16¾ percent of the total, and roughly the size of the state of Connecticut (5,009 square miles), little more than half the size of New Jersey (7,836 square miles). The population is divided: Less than two thirds, about 3.1 million, live in the Irish Republic—roughly 100,000 of them Protestant. A bit more than 1.6 million people, almost as many as live in the City of Philadelphia (population: 1.7 million), live in Northern Ireland, and about 1.1 million are Protestant.

Is that division not absurd?

It is absurd, and intolerable—to many people inside both elements of the island and beyond it, not the least to many Americans.

To most of the residents of Northern Ireland it is the opposite of absurd. In their eyes and hearts today, maintaining partition from the Irish Republic is fundamental to their sense of religious belief and heritage, to their cultural identity and to their physical, economic, political and social well-being.

That division is the basis of the agonies of Ireland. Beyond Ireland's shores, it agonizes vast numbers of other people, both involved and uninvolved.

What is partition?

History offers indictments for partition's cause and consequences that cover a millenium and more and can fill a library. If the Tyrant History is for the moment set aside, however, partition owes its force to religious identity—Christian denomination. The implications are far more complex. They are more tragic by far than any disciple of the avowed common Savior of all of them could rationalize.

The population of the Irish Republic is between 95 and 98 percent Roman Catholic. The most persuasive assessments, from within and outside the church, suggest about 80 percent are devoutly practicing members of the church, by many appraisals the highest density of genuine Christian piety left in any country on earth.

The population of Northern Ireland, in contrast, is about 31 percent Catholic, approximately 478,000. There are somewhat more than one million non-Catholics, most of them professing Protestants: about 406,000 Presbyterians, 335,000 members of the Church of Ireland (an element of the Anglican communion that like the Episcopal Church in America derives from Church of England), 71,000 Methodists, 87,000 of other Protestant denominations including Congregationalist, Baptist, Unitarian, Christian Scientist and a large number of other smaller denominations many of them evangelical. An additional 143,000 give censustakers no denomination, but demographically are estimated to be Protestant at least in proportion to the rest of the population. (In the last census, 2,633 people in the Republic and 959 in Northern Ireland identified themselves as Jewish—.08 percent of the total population. And in Northern Ireland there's a legendary response when one is mentioned: "Oh yes, but is he [she] a Protestant Jew or a Roman Catholic Jew?")

The conflicts are not spiritual. They are broader and deeper and more bitter than theological differences—and dolorously un-Christian. They are atavistic, economic, tribal and paranoic—and after all that, political. In that, the conficts share common qualities of implacable passion and ineffable aspiration with the sentiments of Jews and Palestinians for the land that today is Israel.

As in the Middle East, there is a plethora of historic justifications for murderous violence. The Protestant majority enjoys and perpetuates advantages over Catholics in virtually every aspect of the economy. There are inequities and injustices, and there have been, and are, failures in dealing with them. As anywhere on earth where there is bitter conflict, however, if there is to be hope for peace, those arguments must be set aside.

Today the choice is clear. The only responsible choice must be based on a resolve to ease, then reconcile, the conflict, whether that should lead to a peaceful unification of Ireland or not. That choice cannot be between one sectarian community or the other. To make that choice and to press if forward with material aid or energy—which many Americans do, directly and indirectly—is to become part of the problem. It is to augment agony, to perpetuate conflict, or to contribute—however earnestly, romantically, stupidly—to raising today's violence toward a very present danger of civil war.

There is one humane, intelligent alternative. It is to identify with the humanity in Northern Ireland, in all its defiant complexity and conflict. It is to insist that acceptance, understanding and discipline be turned to easing fears, bridging chasms and nourishing common accord. The American people and government can contribute much, in ways which must be examined in detail.

That is a complex challenge which will demand patience, hard work and decisiveness. But only in such efforts is there promise of stemming the tide of misery.●

INTERNATIONAL SALES CORPORATIONS

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, late last session I, and my distinguished colleague, Representative SAM GIBBONS, chairman of the Ways and Means Trade Subcommittee, introduced legislation designed to stimulate debate and discussion with respect to export incentives. Our bill, H.R. 5179, establishes International Sales Corporations (ISC's).

H.R. 5179 is designed to replace our current worldwide system of taxation of exports with a territorial tax system, a system similar to that used by most of our major trading partners. Under a territorial tax system, a company would pay taxes in the country in which it was located. The International Sales Corporation, being outside the taxing jurisdiction of the United States, would pay no U.S. income taxes on qualified exports.

As I stated upon introduction of H.R. 5179, the bill would use ISC's to replace Domestic International Sales Corporations (DISC's). DISC was first enacted to provide an incentive for companies to increase the volume of their exports. Unfortunately, the limited benefits DISC provides fall short of the export incentives our major trading partners provide their exporters. DISC has become more of a prize exporters receive at the end of the year for exporting than a real export incentive.

In addition, DISC has been under repeated attack as not conforming with the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). Although a cease-fire now exists in GATT with regard to the conflicts about DISC, the terms of the cease-fire permit any GATT member to reopen the controversy at any time.

H.R. 5179 was drafted to provide a real export incentive which, at the same time, would be GATT-conforming. Those objectives tend to conflict in our U.S. Tax Code, so that proper drafting has become a problem. We have therefore been considering several changes in some of the original bill's provisions.

The current bill requires an ISC to purchase export products from a manufacturer or other party who is related to one of the ISC shareholders. The ISC is also required to sell its products to an unrelated party. These rules, however, could result in the elimination of some of the incentives we wanted to provide. This is especially true with respect to the rules regarding related party sales. We therefore are considering modifying the related party sales provisions of H.R. 5179 to permit an ISC to continue the current DISC practice of selling to related companies abroad.

We are also considering modifying the bill to provide greater incentives for smaller business to export. There is a great reservoir of potential small business exports which, if tapped, could substantially reduce our current trade deficits. The provision we are considering adding would allow smaller exporters to maintain the ISC officer in the United States, although they would still be required to form, and maintain, some de minimus corporate presence in a foreign country.

A third modification we are considering would also be of the greatest benefit to smaller exporters. Under the current bill, an ISC is limited to four shareholders, each of which is required to own at least 25 percent of the ISC stock. In order to facilitate the formation of ISC's by smaller exporters, we are considering expanding the number of ISC shareholders permitted.

The preliminary redrafting of H.R. 5179 is far from finished. The modifications outlined above are merely the first of what will most likely be several changes in the original draft of the bill. We continue to urge all of our colleagues, and any other interested parties, to join us in developing a comprehensive export incentive program, and welcome any comments or suggestions for additional changes.●

FmHA RURAL WATER BILL

HON. TOM HARKIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Rural Domestic Water Supply and Waste Disposal Facilities Act of 1982 on the behalf of myself, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. DORGAN, and Mr. PANETTA.

The need for this legislation has been promoted by the failure of the Farmers Home Administration to implement the provisions of the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981 with respect to the operation of the FmHA water and waste disposal loan program.

Last year the administration proposed an increase in the interest rate from 5 percent to the bond market rate which was 12.25 percent at the end of the first quarter of fiscal year 1982. The administration argued that this increase would help target the funds to low-income communities. Many of us on both sides of the aisle questioned this logic, but wanted to meet the Secretary at least halfway. Therefore, we raised the interest rate ceiling to market rate but retained subsidized loans for those communities with median incomes below the poverty level and other communities that might be determined to be low income by the Secretary. The idea was to provide the Secretary with flexibility in administering the program. But congressional intent was clear—communities that need subsidies should get them and communities that do not need them should pay the bond market rate.

We also set aside 75 percent of the grants for low-income communities. Again with funds drastically reduced—fiscal year 1981, funding $1 billion; fiscal year 1982, funding $500 million—we wanted to be sure that the neediest were served first. I have been disappointed with what has transpired. Implementation of this program has not been in line with congressional intent. For example, the Secretary has not used his discretion in defining low-income communities. Rather, he has used the poverty guideline for individuals as the only standard for eligibility. As a result, few, if any communities in my State and most other States, are now eligible for 5-percent loans. Further, the 75-percent set-aside of grant funds was issued and withdrawn.

As a result of this disregard of congressional intent the program does not work. By narrow interpretation of the statute, resulting in the virtual elimination of the 5-percent loan, FmHA has rendered the program virtually useless for needy communities. According to my calculations, assuming a market rate loan and a typical capital cost per user of $8,000 and a 75-percent grant, the minimum community median income necessary to qualify for the program is almost $25,000.

First quarter fiscal year 1981 statistics appear to bear out my point. According to FmHA only 4 percent of the funds were spent in the first quarter. A total of 41 loans were made, 93 percent were at the market rate, only 3 loans were made at the 5-percent interest rate. No grants were made to these three communities receiving 5-percent loans. In short, no grants were made to low-income communities, in clear disregard of congressional intent. From what I can tell, virtually all of the grants were made to communities receiving market rate loans. These communities are not, by the agencies own definition, low income.

We have continued to speak out on this problem. The conferees on the farm bill added report language requiring the Secretary to set a higher standard for income eligibility for subsidized loans so that more communities would be eligible. The mandate for set aside of 75 percent of grants was also reiterated. Lastly, FmHA was instructed to set up a project selection procedure so that applications would be ranked on the basis of income, community size and existence of health and safety hazards. FmHA has issued no regulations on any of these congressional directives. Here we are today with a program that does not work except for the wealthiest communities. Bureaucratic rigamarole abounds and those communities that need clean drinking water wait, and wait, and wait.

Because of this record of disregard of congressional intent and bureaucratic bungling, I have introduced a bill to implement the changes in the FmHA water and waste disposal program requested under statute and report language. The key points of this legislation are—

One. A sliding interest rate ranging from 5 percent to the average bond market rate;

Two. A sliding scale on grant size based on community income and community size. The maximum grant is, as now in current law, 75 percent;

Three. A project selection system which provides for ranking of all applications based on three equally weighted factors: health and safety hazards, community income, and community size;

Four. Congressional review of all FmHA regulations to insure that in the future the wishes of the Congress are carried out; and Five. A variety of cost savings measures including creation of a predevelopment fund and technical assistance program for small communities.

Recognizing spending limitations, we are requesting no new funds beyond current fiscal year 1983 budget estimates for authorizations.

I believe my colleagues will agree that we must do better than the program we have now. There is no excuse for the FmHA record of implementation on this program. We should move forward with the clear and precise direction as contained in this bill so that there can be no mistake about our intent.●

RETIREMENT OF LIEUTENANT POWELL

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, as a friend of law enforcement it gives me great pleasure to honor an outstanding police officer from Oxnard, Calif. Lt. Charles P. Powell.

On Friday evening, February 19, 1982, the Oxnard Police Officer's Club will honor the retirement of Lieutenant Powell. Lieutenant Powell had dedicated 29½ years of public service to his community. He joined the Oxnard Police Department of June 1, 1952, as a rookie patrolman. On May 1, 1956, he was promoted to sergeant, and received the rank of lieutenant on August 1, 1963. He and his wife Betty have two daughters and one son: Sandra, Tamara, Charles.

During the past 3 years, Lieutenant Powell has been in charge of internal affairs and prior to that he was the head of records and the bureau of identification.

Throughout his distinguished career, Lieutenant Powell has displayed great competence and dedication in service to his community. Thus, I join with his many friends in the Oxnard area who wish him well during his retirement and thank him for a job well done.●

UNDERSTANDING THE CLEAN AIR DEBATE

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, The House of Representatives and the Senate will shortly begin active debate and markup of legislation to reauthorize and amend the Federal law that provides the framework for the Nation's air quality management program. These markups follow extensive Congressional hearings and the bipartisan, $10 million report by the National Commission on Air Quality. The Commission report and the testimony of hundreds of witnesses corroborate the need for change.

The reauthorization promises to be lively. The scope and specific amendment remain speculative and will be highly controversial. Industry, environmentalists, and other segments of the society have been organizing and preparing for this debate since amendments were made to the law in 1977.

To help interested citizens better understand the debate I asked the professional staff of the Energy and Commerce Committee to define a few of the key terms. I apologize for the technical and legal jargon but assure you that they comprise only a small portion in this regulatory maze. The actual law is 173 pages and is implemented through more than 2,500 pages of complex regulation. Anne Gorsuch, Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, recently stated,

The Clean Air Act is the most comprehensive and complicated regulatory scheme that has ever been conceived by any group of people.

Others have described it as the Lawyers Full-Employment Act. This glossary should help one understand news accounts and sift through the charges and countercharges which are sure to arise as the debate continues.

GLOSSARY OF KEY TERMS

NATIONAL AMBIENT AIR QUALITY STANDARDS

The 1970 Clean Air Act required the Environmental Protection Agency to develop national ambient air quality standards to protect the public health of the most susceptible segments of the population with an additional margin of safety and to protect public welfare from any known or anticipated adverse effects. Congress expressly prohibited the Agency from considering the difficulty of compliance or the cost for control when setting the standards. Standards have been set for six non-hazardous pollutants. These include sulfur oxides, particulates, carbon monoxide, ozone, nitrogen and lead.

The standards for each pollutant are expressed as a maximum allowable value for a specified time period of measurement. For example, the maximum allowable value for carbon monoxide in a single 1 hour period is 35 parts per million (ppm). An area would be classified as not meeting the Federal standard if carbon monoxide levels exceeded 35 parts per million twice for any of the 8,760 hourly periods in one year. The short time periods for measurement, the vagaries of natural phenomenon and unreliable monitoring equipment all play havoc with compliance determinations.

STATE IMPLEMENTATION PLANS

These are voluminous documents prepared by each State describing the quality of the air, the sources of pollution and the strategy by which emissions will be controlled in order to attain and maintain NAAQS. State Implementation Plans contain a staggering amount of detailed information. They may include items as varied as the emission limits for every industrial plant, the design parameters for specific pollution control equipment, and the number of miles of bike paths to be built in the next 3 years. The State Implementation Plan and supporting documentation for Illinois fills a bookshelf, while the one for California fills a small truck.

The Environmental Protection Agency must evaluate each State Implementation Plan to determine that the State has designed and made provision to implement an aggressive program to achieve all national standards within a specified date. The Environmental Protection Agency must also approve any modification to the State plan. Implementation of programs specified in a State Implementation Plan is Federally enforceable.

ATTAINMENT DEADLINES

In the 1970 Act, Congress set 1975 as the date by which all States must be in compliance with the National Ambient Air Quality Standards. The 1975 attainment date was overly optimistic, and despite good faith efforts, many areas of the country could not meet this deadline. In 1977, Congress recognized that the original deadline was unrealistic. The Clean Air Act was amended and the deadline for meeting National Ambient Air Quality Standards was extended to 1982, with a provision for an additional extension to 1987 for ozone and carbon monoxide. A number of cities such as Los Angeles and Houston will probably not meet either the 1982 or 1987 deadline for every pollutant. The combination of geography, prevailing meteorology, and composition and size of the industrial base will prevent compliance—unless most vehicles are taken off the road and many facilities are closed.

NONATTAINMENT OR "DIRTY AIR" AREAS

Over 650 counties are presently not meeting one or more of the NAAQS. While a few counties have serious air pollution problems the majority are of limited duration.

An area is called non-attainment when a predictive computer model indicates or a monitor records two "violations" or exceedences of the specified standard in a one year period for any one of the six pollutants. No distinction is made between an area with two violations and an area with 100; both are called non-attainment. Nor is any distinction made whether the violation is 1 ppm or 100 ppm or between the area that exceeds the standard for one pollutant and the area that exceeds the standards for five different pollutants, even though areas are classified as non-attainment by pollutant. Both Hillsborough, New Hampshire and Los Angeles, California are classified non-attainment and subject to additional and costly programs.

By and large, the media describe any area that exceeds a standard as "dirty and unhealthy." While graphic, this description is not totally accurate. Recall that the standard is set to protect the most sensitive segments of the population and with a margin of safety. Many non-attainment areas have only minimal excursions above a standard and these often occur in localized hot spots such as congested downtown traffic intersections. Another common misconception is the assumption that the entire population living in a non-attainment area is adversely affected by an exceedence of the standard. For example, the most common exceedence of the carbon monoxide standard is the 8 hour average and this usually occurs in the winter. Thus, only those susceptible and outdoors in the specific area where the exceedence occurred are at any risk. The probability of all these events occurring simultaneously in most non-attainment areas is quite small. This is particularly relevant given the findings of recent studies that indicate that the average person spends 85% of his or her time indoors.

CONSTRUCTION BANS, FEDERAL SANCTIONS, AND ENFORCEMENT PENALTIES

The Act requires the Federal government to take civil and criminal actions and impose penalties for plants that fail to meet emission limitations. The Environmental Protection Agency must also abrogate State air quality programs when the plans are deemed inadequate. In addition, Federal grants for highways and sewers must be withheld and all permits for construction or modification of industrial plants denied if the State cannot develop a State Implementation Plan that shows attainment by the statutory deadlines.

As a result of the unrealistic attainment deadlines contained in the Act, a number of companies and States are currently being penalized by the construction ban and economic sanctions. Some are caught in a regulatory "Catch-22" despite their good faith efforts at controlling emissions. For example, because the State of California cannot develop a realistic plan to show attainment by 1987 for ozone, Chevron Oil Company, Inc. has been unable to proceed with a project in Richmond, California intended to allow Chevron to process domestic heavy crude oil. The project would have reduced pollution emissions because old, minimally-controlled units would have been replaced with new less polluting facilities. As a result of the construction ban, therefore, an environmentally and energy-beneficial capital investment program has been blocked.

Unless these provisions of the Act are modified, many States will be forced to submit bogus documents, affectionately known in the trade as "cheater SIPs" in order to continue economic growth and environmental progress. Enormous political and bureaucratic pressure will be applied to the Environmental Protection Agency to approve these bogus documents because, without approval, construction bans and sanctions must be applied. The Environmental Protection Agency, under the current law, must impose sanctions or "look the other way" and run the risk of citizen suits to enforce the law.

The Act's compliance mechanisms may be delaying clean-up. The combustion of fossil fuels in both vehicles and industrial plants is the primary source of air pollution. Modern, energy efficient plants and cars are inherently less polluting than old, energy guzzling dinosaurs. When equipped with best available pollution controls, these new plants and cars result in no net increase in pollution as they replace old, uncontrolled plants and cars, and may actually reduce emissions several fold. Thus, economic growth occurs in tandem with environmental progress.

ATTAINMENT OR "CLEAN AIR AREAS"

To insure that areas presently meeting national standards remain in attainment, Congress established a separate set of requirements to manage growth. All new industrial plants with the potential to emit pollution in amounts above a minimal level established by the Environmental Protection Agency must receive a construction permit and install the best available pollution control technology. In addition, Congress codified a Court ruling that required the Environmental Protection Agency to develop a program to prevent significant deterioration in areas presently meeting air quality standards. This program has numerous controversial requirements including a three tiered classification system and a complex increment system which restricts new emissions from plants that emit sulfur dioxide or particulate matter in excess of arbitrary determined fractions of the national air quality standards. The program when fully operational will also include regulations to protect visibility and other "air quality values". The program was the result of litigation and has been subject to continual court challenges.

MANDATORY TECHNOLOGICAL CONTROLS

The Clean Air Act has a number of requirements that are independent of the pollution controls necessary to meet National Ambient Quality Standards. These requirements have no direct correlation with the achievements of the standards, but rather are designed to insure that all new stationary and mobile sources are controlled. The philosophy and regulations encourage add-on technology or hardware to clean-up pollution.

For automobiles, Congress specified in 1970 that emissions for carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons, and oxides of nitrogen would be reduced by 90 percent from the uncontrolled level. This was a uniform requirement regardless of the air quality in the area where the car was to be operated. By 1977, Congress recognized that achievement of a 90 percent reduction in oxides of nitrogen was infeasible, and established it as a research objective only. Because of a short Congressionally established deadline the only apparent means of compliance involved installation of a catalytic converter on each car and the use of unleaded gasoline. Congress also required that new industrial plants meet New Source Performance Standards which require, as a minimum, the best demonstrated pollution control system regardless of the quality of the air where the plant was to be built. In addition, industrial plants that use fossil fuels were required to apply the best technological system for continuous control and reduce sulfur dioxide by a specified percentage.

Our law and accompanying regulations encourage pollution control through add-on hardware in contrast to the German and Japanese approach that encourages emission reductions through engineering design, energy efficiency, and commercial utilization of by-products. Our law results in pollution control costs being treated as an externality rather than making environmental protection an integral part of the production process. The irrational approach has been fostered by the IRS definition of pollution control equipment that qualifies for tax exempt bonds as add-on hardware designed to reduce emissions. Since add-on hardware imposes variable costs and at times hinders efficient operation of the process, government inspection and enforcement is required to insure continued operation and maintenance of the pollution control equipment. The new inspection and maintenance program for automobiles in Virginia is a prime example of this process.

CONCLUSION

The Clean Air Act is an extremely complex piece of legislation with numerous ambiguities and questionable assumptions. Modification and simplification is essential if areas of the country are to continue experiencing economic growth while enjoying environmental protection. However, rational change will not occur during 1982 reauthorization if tempers flare and communication between divergent parties deteriorates to multi-syllabic diatribes. Nor will the legitimate goals of simplicity and increased effectiveness be reached if Members of Congress are bombarded by a flood of single interest, self-serving amendments that are drafted without concern for the dynamics or goals of the entire program. The Clean Air Act is vital legislation that needs to be reauthorized and modified to address the needs and concerns of a multi-faceted society.●

FUTURE HOMEMAKERS OF AMERICA—TOWARD NEW HORIZONS

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in announcing that February 7-13 has been designated as National Future Homemakers of America Week. All across the United States, and in its territories, over 395,000 FHA members invite us to join them and grow with them. These young people want to demonstrate the importance of vocational education, and specifically, how home economics education soundly prepares students for their future.

Future Homemakers of America is open to boys and girls through grade 12, and is now over 12,500 chapters strong. There are two kinds of chapters: Those which emphasize consumer homemaking, and those devoted to home economics related occupations. This organization is working hard to expand their traditional image. Today, anyone who contributes to the quality of life in the home is a homemaker. Even as the roles of men and women continue to change, the Future Homemakers concentrate on strengthening the basic unit of our society—the family.

FHA members realize that they have unlimited potential to make a difference in their community. Current projects include service to young children, the handicapped, and the elderly. Together with the March of Dimes, they have sponsored the peer education project "Health Babies: Chance of Choice" which has reached over 3 million teenagers. Local chapters may address such concerns as health and nutrition, youth unemployment, and energy conservation. Certainly each and every one of these students enriches the world around him.

My home State of Kentucky was the first State to charter the Future Homemakers of America in 1945. There, over 12,000 FHA members in 248 chapters share practical skills with other members of their community. I am especially proud of the chapters in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, which I have the honor to represent, because these chapters remain extremely active year after year.

I know that 1982 will be a very special year for the Future Homemakers. This fall, the national office will move into its new headquarters and leadership center in Reston, Va., a suburb of our Nation's Capital. Student members, corporations, and foundations have all contributed generously in order to help this organization have a secure financial future.

One of the nicest things that has ever happened to me was being selected as an honorary member of the Future Homemakers of America. I would like to congratulate these enthusiastic girls and boys on their past accomplishments, and wish them every success in all their future endeavors.●

CUTS IN NEW DEFENSE BUDGET

HON. LES ASPIN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, the defense budget has yet to be sent to the Hill, but already cuts on the order of $8 billion to $10 billion are being talked about by both Democrats and Republicans. What has brought about this new mood and opened the door for defense cuts has been the concern over enormous deficits.

There is no question defense can be cut. The trick is to cut in such a way that it does not damage national security. Here there is a two-point dilemma to be faced. First, our defense posture is far from perfect. There are holes in it that will cost money to repair, particularly in readiness. Second, to reduce the deficit we must cut outlays and the best way to reduce outlays is to cut readiness. More about this later.

THE DEFENSE BUDGET AND THE ALTERNATIVES

According to press reports, President Reagan will propose a Department of Defense budget for fiscal year 1983 totaling about $258 billion in budget authority and $215 billion in outlays.

At these levels, the real growth rate is higher than the 7 percent the President urged for planning purposes. That is because the inflation rate has been falling since the $215 billion figure was settled on. The Carter administration found that inflation averaged 2 percentage points higher than official projections, but the Reagan administration, thanks to the recession, is finding that its inflation rates are under the forecast. All in all, it looks like the real growth rate in the fiscal 1983 defense budget for both outlays and defense budget authority will exceed 10 percent.

One alternative to the Reagan defense budget then is to hold real growth to the 7-percent rate he originally prescribed. Other alternatives would be to reduce further the real rate of growth.

[1] High inflation (percent)	8.6	8.0	7.2
Low inflation (percent)	6.7	6.0	5.3

Table 1 gives a menu of choices. For example, if we want to maintain a 7-percent rate of real growth, we can cut the Reagan defense budget by $4.7 billion to $7.1 billion, depending on inflation assumptions. Note that table 1 is given in outlays which means that each dollar of reduction is a direct reduction in the deficit.

CHOOSING AMONG THE ALTERNATIVES

What rate of real growth should we choose? There are very few benchmarks and none of them are particularly helpful.

President Carter proposed 3-percent yearly increases after inflation, but when inflation exceeded his expectations he did not compensate with more money for defense. As a result, defense spending hardly grew at all in real terms from 1977 to 1979.

The Soviets increase their defense spending at a fairly stable rate every year. The CIA estimates a 3-percent real growth rate measured in dollars and up to 5-percent real growth measured in rubles. These numbers are not exact and much of the Soviet increase goes to the Chinese border, but they do reflect a steady Soviet trend over the last two decades.

If we want the defense share of GNP to remain constant, we would probably hold real growth to the 3-percent rate experienced by the economy as a whole during the 1970's. If we think the defense share of GNP, currently about 5.5 percent, is too low, then we would want to increase defense spending by more than 3 percent.

None of these benchmarks is definitive. Selecting a growth rate is essentially a judgment call. The judgment centers on whether the most important priority is building up our defenses or averting further damage to the economy. We should provide more readiness in a great hurry if we believe that the prospects of going to war with Moscow in the next 18 months are very high. If we consider that a strong economy is important to national security and that the danger of war is not eminent, we can build up the forces at a more gradual pace.

Three principles can be used to guide the choice of a growth rate. First, the choice of a growth rate is somewhat arbitrary. Second, it probably matters more how we spend the increase than how large the increase is. Third, it is better to have a steady growth in defense, whatever the rate, than an erratic one. When budgets follow a roller coaster pattern, the services start and stop programs in a process that only results in waste. What is more, private enterprise suppliers are leery of crash buildups that do not promise long-term markets.

DOING THE LEAST DAMAGE TO DEFENSE

The cut of $5 to $10 billion being mentioned by some Republican leaders would take a big chunk out of the deficit. But these are outlay figures. In order to cut $1 in outlays it is necessary to cut several dollars in budget authority. That is the major dilemma facing any effort to cut the defense budget.

The problem is that different categories of defense spending have very different spend-out rates, as shown in table 2.

TABLE 2.—OUTLAY RATES BY WEAPONS AND APPROPRIATIONS CATEGORY

[Percent spent (i.e., outlays) each year of 1st yr budget authority]

	1st yr	2d yr	3d yr	4th yr	5th yr
Procurement	12.0	37.3	30.1	11.1	4.7
Ships	2.4	11.5	18.0	18.0	18.0

Personnel	98.0	2.0
DOD total	64.7	19.0	9.7	3.4	1.4

As the table demonstrates, if you wished to cut $10 billion in aircraft outlays this year you would have to cut aircraft budget authority by $100 billion (the whole budget authority for aircraft for 1983 is less than $35 billion). However, if you wanted to cut $10 billion in operations and maintenance outlays you would only have to cut O. & M. budget authority by $12 billion (out of a total operation and maintenance budget of $73 billion). Given this choice, it is a pretty good guess that the cuts are going to come exactly where they should not be, in the operations and maintenance account that funds readiness.

This is the way it has always been—and it is a major cause of the weakness in our defenses. For years we have been underfunding the operations and maintenance account precisely because the annual budget process focuses on shortrun savings, where we get the most outlay savings for any budget authority cut.

If we are honest with ourselves, we must recognize that is going to happen again this year.

Table III gives a fairly complete list of all of the cuts in defense that have been talked about by critics of defense spending along with the outlay figures that could be saved if the programs were cut. The table shows how difficult it is to get any outlay savings in the first year. Even if all of these cuts were accepted—and there's no way that is going to happen—you still get less than $6 billion in outlay savings.

CONCLUSIONS

There are three things we can do to get out of the rut we are in.

First, Congress needs to take off its blinders and approach defense budgets as a multiyear function and not just an exercise in holding down this year's outlays.

Second, in the national interest we should put an end to feast or famine defense budgeting. Liberals and conservatives, Republicans and Democrats should compromise on a growth rate that will not be subject to drastic shifts. What is going on now is that we are held hostage to page 1. If the newspapers are filled with stories about the Russians invading Afghanistan, nothing is too good for our Armed Forces. But if all the headlines shout about deficits and recession, the knives are out.

Third, when readiness items are going to be cut, we ought to rank military units by priority and channel readiness funds to them in the order in which they would be needed in an emergency. A spare parts shortage should not be spread out democratically across all 19 active Army and Marine divisions; some units should have unquestioned call on any and all spare parts needed. Funds for exercises should be assigned to those units before all others.

We should not find ourselves in the position discovered by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger in 1975 when he ordered every Navy ship near the Gulf of Thailand to sail to the scene of the seizure of the Mayaguez—only to find that not one of those Navy ships could sail at full speed because of longstanding maintenance problems.●

CLOSING STATEMENT OF CHAIRMAN DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, February 4, the full Committee on Ways and Means conducted an extensive oversight hearing on the administration's recent reversal of a long-standing national policy to deny tax-exempt status to racially discriminatory private schools. The purpose of this hearing was to explore the legal justification for and implications of the administration's change in policy. We took extensive testimony from legal scholars, former Treasury and Justice Department officials and representatives of the administration.

The results of our hearing and the conclusions we reached with respect to the proper course to be pursued were admirably summed up in a closing statement made by our distinguished chairman, Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI's statement is of such fundamental importance that I believe it warrants the close attention of all Members. I want to take this opportunity, therefore, to insert the chairman's statement into the RECORD.

CLOSING STATEMENT OF CHAIRMAN DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

Much of the testimony given today troubles me. I am struck by the carelessness—or naivete—with which the Administration reversed long-standing civil rights law. Clearly, they chose to ignore a substantial body of law that has guided Federal policy against discrimination—under both Democratic and Republican Administrations—over the last 12 years.

Testimony today raises fundamental doubts concerning this Administration's intent on executing laws developed by Congress and the courts.

The law of the land is not erased when Administrations change. The law—in this case the law against racial discrimination in private schools—transcends political changes in Washington. The Executive Branch can't ignore the body of law developed by the Congress and legal precedents established by the Judiciary. Only the Supreme Court can overturn the decisions of other courts, and only the Congress can change the statutes which reflect earlier policy decisions.

I think the majority of members on this committee find it hard to believe that a decision which confronts such a fundamental legal and moral standard in this country was reached over a period of only three weeks—and was based on an after-the-fact legal analysis of such dubious scholarship. We have no evidence that a legal case for the decision was made before January 5—the same day a memorandum reveals the public relations strategy for releasing the policy change so as to escape early criticism in the media.

Nor is there evidence that the Administration's case was in any way shaped by attorneys in the Tax Division of the Justice Department or the Treasury Department or even in the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department—all traditional sources of legal judgment within every administration. Instead, the legal justification for ignoring years of anti-discrimination rulings all the way to the Supreme Court was prepared by "special assistants" to the Attorney General and Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights. Indeed, they reflect a very selective memory regarding various legal precedents and legislative history over the last 12 years.

Existing law, as enacted by the Congress and as interpreted by the courts, is very clear. It denies tax exemption to private schools that practice racial discrimination. Many of us, then, are unconvinced as to why this Administration is asking for additional legislation and "clear" statutory authority.

The testimony presented to this Committee today by the panel of legal scholars compels us to find no justification for the position of the Administration that additional legislation is necessary.

I strongly urge the Administration to review the existing body of law—to withdraw its position on this issue—and to conclude that the law is clear and must be faithfully executed. Of equal importance, the Administration must take the action necessary to let the Supreme Court hear the cases of Bob Jones University and Goldsboro on the merits.●

NICARAGUA: THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE REVOLUTION

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the Council for Inter-American Security Educational Institute recently prepared a study on Nicaragua. The analysis concludes the Sandinistas are well down their path toward consolidation of the revolution, which must be interpreted as the establishment of a military-oriented dictatorship following Marxist-Leninist ideology.

The first of two parts of this study follows. I urge my colleagues to give it their serious consideration.

NICARAGUA: THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE REVOLUTION

The original Sandinista facade of political pluralism and non-alignment has collapsed. Church and human rights leaders recently charged that the new Nicaragua has become a police state dominated by Cuba, and the Sandinistas now openly proclaim their "solidarity" with some of the most radical regimes and movements in the Third World.

Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo said last month that Nicaragua is governed not by the junta, but by Cubans. At a Latin American Episcopal Congress (CELAM) meeting in Bogota, Colombia, on November 16, Obando y Bravo charged that the key positions in Nicaragua are occupied by men close to Fidel Castro. The regime is totalitarian and Marxist-Leninist, the Archbishop said. His remarks, which were reported by Agence France Press, unfortunately were not publicized in this country.

Perhaps the most devastating indictment ever made of the Nicaraguan regime was communicated in an Open Letter dated October 17 to junta coordinator Daniel Ortega from Jose Esteban Gonzalez, the Coordinator of the Nicaraguan Human Rights Commission. Gonzalez noted that he was not allowed to travel to Geneva, Switzerland, last September 8 to attend a session of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearance under the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. He said that migration and customs officials, obeying orders of the Nicaraguan political police, confiscated valuable documents and photographs that belonged to the Nicaraguan Human Rights Commission.

Gonzalez charged that the Sandinistas' political project is "totalitarian" and "based on the objectives, programs and methods of the failed Cuban revolution."

Gonzalez criticized "the creation through the power of the state and the Sandinista mass organizations of shock groups of a clear fascist connotation, similar to those used by Hitler, Mussolini, and other dictators of different kinds, to attack the members and destroy the offices of the political, labor, religious, and humanitarian organizations and the news media of democratic orientation."

Gonzalez also cited "the promulgation of laws of retroactive and clearly repressive character, the mistreatment and killing of prisoners, including minors, old people and invalids, without a believable explanation of such crimes and abuses and without punishment of the guilty," and the Sandinistas' "apparent alignment * * * with Soviet-Cuban interventionist objectives."

Even former junta member Arturo Cruz, who resigned recently as Nicaragua's Ambassador to the U.S., now calls himself a "dissident." He said in an interview in the November 20 Boston Globe that the Sandinista government's anti-American rhetoric has not worked. "This ritual of speeches, mass rallies, and Cuba-style revolution has been a total failure," he said.

MARXISM-LENINISM

It is the Sandinistas themselves, however, who have done the most convincing job of clarifying the nature of the new Nicaragua. Defense Minister Humberto Ortega, for example, said in a speech published on August 25 that "We are anti-Yankee, we are against the bourgeoisie" and that "Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution."

Ortega, who is Commander in Chief of the Sandinista People's Army and National Chief of the Sandinista Militia, said that "without Sandinism we cannot be Marxist-Leninist, and Sandinism without Marxism-Leninism cannot be revolutionary. That is why they are indissolubly united, and that is why our moral force is Sandinism, our political force is Sandinism, and our doctrine is Marxism-Leninism."

Denouncing the United States' "perverse and slanderous anti-communist propaganda," Ortega explained that the world is divided in two camps; "on one side the camp of imperialism, the camp of capitalism headed by the United States and the rest of the capitalist countries of Europe and of the world, and on the other side the socialist camp, composed of distinct countries of Europe, Asia, and Latin America, with the Soviet Union as their vanguard." Ortega left no doubt that Nicaragua is now in what he called the "socialist" camp.

The speech created a furor in Nicaragua. Later Ortega called upon Sandinista militia members to draw up lists of government enemies and said that anyone supporting "the plans of North American imperialism" would "be the first to appear hanging along the roads and highways of the country," according to the October 13 Miami Herald.

Ortega also made it clear that the Sandinistas intend to stay in power, no matter what. "We have not promised the elections that they (the bourgeoisie) think we are going to promote, and we are never going to discuss power, as we have already said on other occasions through the National Directorate, because this power was taken by the people with arms, and here the power of the people will never be questioned," Ortega said in the August 25 speech.

Junta member Rafael Cordova Rivas has gone so far as to say that in Nicaragua "we need a dictatorship," according to the November 16 Washington Post.

A NEW PHASE

These declarations, along with the recent arrests of Nicaragua's top businessmen and the sacking of the house belonging to opposition leader Alfonso Robelo, indicate that the Sandinista revolutionary process has moved into a new phase.

"After more then two years of revolutionary ambivalence, Nicaragua's Sandinista government recently has made a sharp turn to the left," said the November 16 Newsweek in an article entitled "Nine Little Castros." A Nicaraguan nurse told Newsweek: "We have traded the dictatorship of one Somoza for the dictatorship of nine little Castros," referring to the ruling 9-man Sandinista Directorate.

The Newsweek article featured a ghastly photograph of Robelo's defaced house after it had been stormed by a jeering mob of 200 pro-Sandinistas carrying cans of paint and plastic bags filled with rocks. "It's looking more like a police state every day," said a neighbor of Robelo's. "The repression is hardening, and basic freedoms are dissolving."

On the international front, the Sandinistas have gone far beyond their support for the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The extraordinary address by junta coordinator Daniel Ortega before the United Nations General Assembly on October 7 made it clear that the new Nicaragua is aligned with some of the world's most extremist regimes and national liberation movements. Ortega proclaimed Nicaragua's "solidarity" with Libya (which he called "a victim of the provocations of U.S. politics"), the PLO, North Korea, Cuba, SWAPO, Grenada, the Algeria-supported Polisario Front, and "heroic Vietnam." Conspicuously, Ortega did not single out a single democratic government for inclusion in his "solidarity" list.

Most of Ortega's address was devoted to a vicious attack on the United States that was uncommon even by UN General Assembly standards. The United States was condemned for its "expansionist mentality" and "the hegemonic policies of the current U.S. administration." Not surprisingly, the Soviet Union was not criticized at all.

Not only are the Sandinistas no longer concealing their ideological affinities, they have taken to wearing their radical politics like a chip on their collective shoulder. Responding to criticism by the Council for Inter-American Security's Colonel Sam Dickens, Commander of the Revolution Luis Carrion Cruz said on October 8 over Radio Sandino that "we are Sandinistas. However, if we are communists, so what?"

U.S. TO BLAME?

Most apologists for the Sandinistas now concede that the regime has become repressive and anti-American. Their new line is that the U.S. is to blame for pushing the Sandinistas into the arms of Castro. For example, Christopher Dickey wrote in a front-page article in the November 22 Washington Post: "Although the Sandinista revolutionary government here is avowedly Marxist oriented and describes itself as 'internationalist,' many observers see this trend in relations as more the product of desperation than a natural affinity with its new allies."

This notion is absurd. The Sandinistas' radical orientation is nothing new. Many of the top leaders in the new Nicaragua were trained in Cuba, and one of the first things the Sandinistas did after they took power was to rush to Moscow and sign a major cooperation agreement with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. The official hymn of the Sandinista National Liberation Front has long included the passage: "'Let us struggle against the Yankee, enemy of humanity."

Furthermore, the U.S. has made several efforts to come to terms with the Sandinistas. Even the Washington Post in its lead editorial on November 25 noted that in August "the Reagan Administration made a still-veiled but reasonable offer of political coexistence to Nicaragua." The Post said that "so far this Administration has been much less the tiger than the tabby in dealing with Nicaragua."

Vice-President George Bush said in a speech in Miami on November 16 that it is still not too late, that if the Sandinistas "reject the totalitarian course" they are on, they will find the U.S. a better friend than Fidel Castro. This is hardly the stuff of intransigence.

CONSOLIDATION

The significance of the Sandinistas' recent declaration of fidelity to Marxist-Leninism, their embrace of radical regimes and movements, and the crackdown on opposition leaders lies in the fact that the Sandinista leaders apparently believe that their revolution is "consolidated" to the point that they can drop the masks they wore to rally the Nicaraguan people to them in the first place. It is no longer necessary to pose as reformist-minded idealists who will lead Nicaragua to a new democracy, political pluralism, freedom and justice.

Totalitarian movements typically reveal their true colors only after taking power. Otherwise, they would alienate important sectors of the society which they need as allies in order to overthrow the existing government. Once securely in power, the totalitarians move to purge the ideologically unfit elements and can eventually announce that they wanted total power all along.

The Eden Patora group is already being purged from the government. Can the dictatorship of proletariat be far behind?

Some observers compare Ortega's August vows of adherence to Marxism-Leninism with Fidel Castro's declaration, two years after he took power, that he had always been a communist.

Castro, in the December 22, 1961, newspaper Revolucion, said: "Of course, if we had stood on Turquino hill, when we were nobody, and said, 'We are Marxist,' we probably could not have come down from the mountains. So we called ourselves by other names. We simply did not talk about it."

Like Fidel, the Sandinistas held out for over two years, posing as revolutionaries but not communists. This tack allowed them to collect millions of dollars in foreign aid from Western countries.

Now it is impossible to continue the charade. The lead editorial in the October 19 Wall Street Journal asked: "Can anyone still doubt that Nicaragua has been a victim of a Communist takeover? The Cuban-style 'neighborhood committees' are in place, the secret police are being trained, La Prensa has been told it will be closed if it continues to speak up, Archbishop Obando y Bravo is being suppressed and a spectacular military build-up is under way."

THE NEW ARMED FORCES

Nicaragua's military build-up has caused some observers to fear that Nicaragua is contemplating carving out its own Vietnam-style empire in Central America.

"The Sandinistas are creating an army and militia of over 250,000, equivalent to a full one-tenth of the population," according to the lead editorial in the October 19 Wall Street Journal. "The combined forces of Nicaragua and Cuba soon will dwarf any army south of the Rio Grande and drive a Soviet strategic wedge between North and South America."

Cuba already has 3,000 soldiers in Nicaragua, according to Pentagon sources cited by ABC television last month. ABC also revealed Pentagon reports that Vietnam is sending Nicaragua 1,000 airplanes and helicopters, most of them made in the U.S. and most of them captured during and after the Vietnam War.

The Sandinistas have also built 27 new military bases in Nicaragua. In an interview that went unnoticed by the major media, Nicaraguan businessman Max Vargas told Miami's Diario Las Americas last month that the new bases correspond to the 27 military zones into which Nicaragua has been divided.

Vargas gave the exact location of each of the new bases, where he said tunnels for munitions deposits, anti-aircraft defenses and subterranean shelters have been built or are being built. "Fifteen of the bases have airports, and there are reports of more than 10 MIG 17 and MIG 21 planes at Puerto Cabezas and Montelimar," said Vargas, who was a member of Nicaragua's Superior Council of Private Enterprise (COSEP) and who now belongs to the Nicaraguan Democratic Union.

Why is Nicaragua building this war machine? Sandinistas cite those ubiquitous "Somozistas" who are supposed to be scattered about the countryside. But it should be noted that junta member Sergio Ramirez "speaks yearningly of Central American union," according to an editorial in the October 18 New York Times.

If the Sandinista vision of a united Central America under Nicaraguan domination is anything like the "united Indo-China" the Vietnamese are seeking to achieve, Nicaragua's neighbors should brace themselves.

The Sandinistas appear to be continuing their efforts to help deliver El Salvador into the hands of the Castro-allied guerrillas. El Salvador's defense minister Colonel Jose Guillermo Garcia told a press conference in Washington, D.C., on November 9 that Cuba continues to send military and economic aid and personnel to the Salvadoran revolutionaries through Nicaragua.

CONCLUSION

The wait-and-see period for Nicaragua is over. The Sandinistas are already well down their path toward "the consolidation of the revolution," which must be understood as a euphemism for the establishment of a military-oriented dictatorship obeying the expansionist dictates of Marxist-Leninist ideology. The new Nicaraguan rulers are providing well for the defense of their regime and have taken to the offense, aiding fraternal revolutionaries in their bid to take power in El Salvador.

Is it already too late to reverse this process? Are the Sandinistas already too powerful to challenge? Has "the consolidation of the revolution" become inevitable? There are still some democratic forces inside Nicaragua, but their resistance is rapidly crumbling in the face of new decrees that restrict more and more the activities of the press, the church, businessmen and the political opposition.

If the Sandinistas are to be stopped, this must be done now, before they succeed in eliminating all dissent and before Nicaragua takes its place beneath the nuclear umbrella of the Soviet Union.●

ABOUT ECONOMIC RECOVERY

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, economic recovery is more than just numbers, charts and graphs—it is people.

After nearly three decades of policy which has robbed people of their ability to find a good job, save some money, and actually achieve their dreams, we have turned the corner with an economic program that will work.

All of the ingredients are there.

As people are once again able to save money, savings will grow and interest rates will decline. Reduced interest rates will allow people to borrow again for homes, cars, and expanded businesses which will create jobs.

Clearly our No. 1 priority must be to expand job opportunities.

Given time and dedication our program to revive America will work. But we must not lose sight of those who desperately need our help—now.

In my home State of Michigan unemployment has grown to 14.4 percent. These are not just statistics on a page but people—some of the most highly skilled and trained workers in the country.

They need our help now. In the next few weeks this Congress will be called upon to consider a supplemental appropriations bill. The President has requested that we restore $2.3 billion in funds to provide for unemployment compensation and equally as important the jobs service program. The jobs service program has placed 13,849 unemployed people in new jobs, just in our Fifth District during the last fiscal year. Without these important funds the jobs service offices are closing. We cannot allow this valuable service to people in need of work to disappear.

I want to commend the members of the Michigan delegation who have worked hard to assure that these funds are restored and to urge all of my colleagues to speed this measure along as quickly as possible.

I would remind my colleagues that there can be no more disheartening experience than to be eager to work, but to find no job available and no one to help. I hope you will join me in supporting this much needed service.●

MICHAEL A. POLLACK, OUTSTANDING YOUNG MAN OF AMERICA

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to my colleagues' attention the naming of my constituent, Michael A. Pollack, as one of this year's "Outstanding Young Men of America." Although only 28 years of age, Mike has made a significant contribution to our communities in Santa Clara County. He has been responsible for the construction of over 2,000 units of housing through his construction company. This done during a time of difficulty in the industry that we are all aware of. His record shows that he is very deserving of this prestigious national award. I am sure he will be a pillar of our community for many years to come.●

RESOLUTION TO SUSPEND MILITARY AID TO EL SALVADOR

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 8, 1982

● Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, last week President Reagan certified to the Congress that the five congressionally imposed conditions on U.S. military assistance to El Salvador are being met. I disagree. I invite Members who agree with my assessment of this evidence to join me in cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 399, a resolution to declare the President's certification null and void, and to terminate military assistance to El Salvador until the Congress can, in good faith, certify that the conditions are truly being met.

Mr. Speaker, President Reagan has certified that the Government of El Salvador is in compliance with the conditions placed by U.S. law on military aid to that country. Many, myself included, disagree, and believe the evidence is overwhelming that the President has certified more to what he wishes were the case in El Salvador, than to what is actually taking place. Thus, the President's certification does not settle the debate surrounding U.S. military aid to El Salvador; it marks simply the beginning of a new phase.

I have today introduced a joint resolution which, if enacted, would declare President Reagan's certification "null and void." This legislation would suspend U.S. military assistance until the House and Senate have jointly concluded that the conditions established by law have truly been achieved.

More individuals died from violence in El Salvador last year than the year before. Systematic acts of kidnapping, torture, and murder continue to be characteristic of Salvadoran security forces. The agrarian reform program is in danger of collapse. The armed forces have continually obstructed efforts to discuss a political solution to the violence, and little real progress in bringing to justice those responsible for the savage murder of U.S. citizens has been achieved.

The Reagan administration wants to believe that its policy in El Salvador has been successful, and it wants Congress and the American people to join in this belief. But conviction in such matters should stem from facts, not from faith, and the tragic facts of El Salvador have not changed.

The conditions placed last year by the Congress on military aid to El Salvador have clearly not been met.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has the responsibility, to itself but more importantly to the public, to guarantee the meaningful implementation of what was a carefully drafted and thoroughly debated provision of law. Failure to satisfy, in fact rather than simply in wish, any of the five conditions spelled out in the law, ought to be sufficient grounds to compel any Member of Congress to support the legislation which has been introduced today. It is my intention to push this resolution to a vote in the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the full House of Representatives as soon as possible. The majority of the American people, according to every available public opinion poll, opposes U.S. military aid to El Salvador. The people have the right, in this election year, to discover, on the record, whether their Representative in Congress shares this view.

Condition 1: The Government of El Salvador must be making a concerted effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights.

Condition 2: The Government of El Salvador must be achieving substantial control over all elements of its own armed forces, so as to bring to an end the indiscriminate torture and murder of Salvadoran citizens by these forces.

The ability of the Government of El Salvador to comply with condition No. 1 depends, in large measure, on its willingness and its ability to meet the standard set by condition No. 2. Hence, for purposes of discussion, these two conditions may be combined.

According to President Reagan's certification, the Government of El Salvador:

Through the removal of officers, institution of a code of conduct, and command emphasis on civilian-military relations and halting abuses . . . has taken concrete steps to bring all elements of its armed forces under control. These efforts are beginning to have a positive effect. The level of violence—and particularly the number of deaths—is difficult to quantify, but statistics compiled by our Embassy in San Salvador indicate a declining level of violence over the past year and a decrease in alleged abuses by security forces. There has been a definite trend in this regard.

This sanguine assessment accords with the view of few other observers either inside or outside El Savador. One reason may be that the source of the President's information is the U.S. Embassy in San Salvador. On January 27, the Washington Post reported that Embassy officials admit that their information "is based entirely on information published in the San Salvador press." That same article states that even Embassy statistics dispute the "trend" claimed in the Reagan certification:

The Report found an encouraging . . . decrease in violence for the September 1980 to September 1981 period that is the main body of the survey, but the official said that the level of violence jumped sharply upward again in November and December and has continued upward in January.

Perhaps the most objective view of the events of 1981 was provided on January 3 by the Apostolic Administrator of San Salvador, Msgr. Arturo Rivera y Damas. Referring to statistics compiled by his office, the monsignor said that in 1981, 11,723 persons had been murdered, most of them peasants between the ages of 16 and 30, many of them noncombatants. He said that an additional 1,808 persons were arrested or were missing, and that most of these were workers, students, or professionals. Rivera y Damas said that the International Red Cross had visited with 775 persons arrested for political reasons.

A number of human rights organizations have either conducted specific studies, or been continuously monitoring the human rights situation in El Salvador during the past year.

According to the legal aid office of the Archdiocese of El Salvador, 10,714 people were killed in "acts of repression" from January 1981 to late September. Of these, 6,703 were estimated to have been killed by the army or by security forces. Many of the others were suspected to have been killed by "death squads" operating with the protection and tolerance of the military.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that some, including Msgr. Rivera y Damas and the Episcopal Conference of El Salvador, have criticized what they describe as the failure of the Legal Aid Office to investigate violent actions taken by leftist forces with the same vigor used to pursue reports of killings committed by the armed forces. This criticism has not extended, however, to a disavowal to repression by the security forces. It should be remembered, also, that U.S. law speaks only to the ability of the government of El Salvador to control its own armed forces and to reduce violations of human rights. In this context the elaborately documented statistics provided by the Legal Aid Office are clearly relevant.

The reports of other organizations provide additional evidence that the government of El Salvador has failed to meet the standard set by the conditions of U.S. Law.

In its 1980–81 annual report, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights found that—

The most serious violation of human rights concerning the right to life, took the form of summary execution. Such executions occur primarily, although not exclusively, in El Salvador and Guatemala.

In the context of the climate of generalized violence prevalent in these two countries, there occurs, in alarming numbers, what the Commission calls illegal or extrajudicial executions.

In most cases, such executions were directly committed by the security forces which act with impunity outside the law, as well as by paramilitary groups which operate with the acquiescence or tacit consent of the governments.

As a general rule, such consent has indicated that governmental authorities do not carry out adequate and effective investigations to determine those responsible for these crimes.

On October 28, the special representative of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights issued a report which included the following findings:

As for civil and political rights, the information collected by the Special Representative has convinced him that, under the regime of the Government Revolutionary Junta which assumed power on 15 October 1979, there has been in El Salvador a consistent pattern of gross violations of these rights which, in many cases has culminated tragically in attempts on human life. Members of the State apparatus, and violent groups of the extreme right apparently acting in collusion with them and armed groups of the extreme left are both responsible for these violations. At present the Special Representative is not in a position to establish, even approximately, how much responsibility lies with one or the other sector, although he has to admit to having received more abundant, precise and detailed information concerning violations of human rights imputable to members of the State apparatus and violent groups of the extreme right.

The Special Representative is also convinced that the executive and judicial organs of the Republic of El Salvador have adopted a very widespread attitude of passivity and inactivity with regard to these violations of human rights.

The Nobel-prizewinning human rights organization Amnesty International released an assessment of the human rights situation in El Salvador on January 25. This statement concluded:

A systematic and brutal policy of government-sponsored intimidation and repression has characterized the past year in El Salvador. People from all sectors of Salvadoran society have been detained without warrant, "disappeared" and been tortured or murdered. Among the reported atrocities have been dismemberments, including children being slashed to death with machetes and decapitated, strangulations, massive bombings and summary executions of internal refugees and displaced persons. Methods of torture while in detention have included the use of electric shock, beatings, the use of sulphuric acid resulting in scorched flesh on portions of the body and the use of hallucinogenic drugs.

It is Amnesty International's considered opinion, after reviewing hundreds of detailed accounts reaching our organization, that in the majority of the reported cases, official security forces have been implicated and that these human rights violations have occurred on such a massive scale that they constitute a gross and consistent pattern of human rights abuses. Testimony received by Amnesty International implicates all branches of the Salvadoran security forces whether nominally military, military police or paramilitary in human rights abuses aimed at civilian members of the population who had no part in guerrilla activity. Sources of information supporting this conclusion have included missions of investigation and observation to the region, including those carried out by Amnesty International as well as other organizations, data provided by Salvadoran human rights and church organizations, foreign and Salvadoran journalists and personal testimonies and reports issued by a wide variety of organizations which have recently visited the country.

Also in January of 1982, the American Civil Liberties Union and the American Watch Committee issued a massively detailed report which found that—

1. The Revolutionary Governing Junta of El Salvador, both by commission and omission, is responsible for a widespread and systematic pattern of gross violations of human rights.

2. Despite its avowedly reformist character, the human rights situation in El Salvador has steadily worsened since the Revolutionary Governing Junta came to power on October 15, 1979. In fact, not since la Matanza, the 1932 massacre of as many as 30,000 peasants, has the human rights situation in El Salvador been as bad as it is now.

3. The violations of human rights taking place in El Salvador are not aberrations. Rather, they are selectively directed against those perceived as opposing the country's economic and political system.

Mr. Speaker, the general findings of these organizations are based on an enormous volume of reported violations of human rights. These include the kidnaping at night of individuals or families, the daily discovery of bodies dumped alongside city streets, and the more dramatic tales of massacres or systematic terrorism perpetrated by the uniformed armed forces of El Salvador.

In November, both the Washington Post and the New York Times reported a "body dump" in El Playon, approximately 15 miles outside San Salvador. According to the Post:

Like many such dumps, El Playon was converted into a clandestine dumping ground for bodies several weeks ago—no one is certain just when. However, the size of the site makes it unique. There are so many bodies—several dozen—perhaps as many as a hundred—that no one is bothering to pick the up any more.

Both newspapers also ran stories, in late January, about what was apparently a major massacre perpetrated by Salvadoran armed forces in or near the village of Mozote in December. If these stories are even generally true, the Reagan administration's boasts with respect to the human rights situation in El Salvador will have to be considered false. This is true not simply because a massacre took place, but because the military unit which led the campaign through the Mozote region area in mid-December was the U.S.-trained Atlacatl Battalion, the unit which has been the focus of U.S. military training and advice throughout the past year.

The response of the U.S. Embassy to stories of the massacres provides an indication, perhaps, of the quality of the information upon which President Reagan relied in making his certification with respect to human rights in El Salvador. According to a Washington Post interview with U.S. Ambassador Deane Hinton, published on January 31:

In December, the Army launched a major offensive in the province of Morazan where large groups of insurgents virtually control the countryside. "That was a big operation," Hinton said. "Over 20 companies. It's the biggest one they ever mounted, and with some of the fewest results, too."

Guerillas and peasants near the town of Mozote in Morazan told visiting reporters that one thing the Army did do on the sweep was massacre hundreds of civilians.

"From the details I read in the story, there definitely must have been something," Hinton said. "But I don't think it's anywhere near what they say in the propaganda."

Hinton said the embassy had been trying, without success, to confirm the events surrounding the alleged massacre. The embassy has considered sending someone to the scene, but, as Hinton put it, "We're not going to go over to Nicaragua and walk in with the guerillas. And I don't know whether Mozote is guerilla territory or not. It sounds like it might be. That's sort of a little problem if it is."

President Reagan's certification alleges that the armed forces are being brought under control and that a serious effort to control human rights abuses has begun to take hold. However, on January 5, the Defense Ministry announced that Eugenio Vides Casanova, the director of the National Guard, was being promoted from colonel to general, and that Francisco Moran, director of the notorious Hacienda Police, was being promoted to full colonel. In addition, an arrest warrant issued for Maj. Robert D'Abuisson, a man whom former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador Robert White characterized as a "pathological killer" with links to the March 1980 murder of Archbishop Oscar Romero, has been withdrawn.

If words can still validly be used to describe what has been and still is occurring inside El Salvador, the Government of that country—and let us remember that the armed forces are very much a part of the Government of El Salvador—is engaged in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights. The rhetoric of Napoleon Duarte and the wishful thinking of Ronald Reagan aside, the facts about what is occurring in El Salvador are plainly there for all, who are not willfully blind to them, to see.

Condition 3: The Government of El Salvador must be demonstrating continued progress in implementing essential economic and political reforms, including land reform and support for the private sector.

What President Reagan describes as the "cornerstone" of the Salvadoran government's reform efforts is the land reform program initiated in early 1980 with the strong backing of the Carter administration and many Salvadoran agriculture experts, such as former Under Secretary of Agriculture Jorge Villacorta Munoz, who have since gone into exile.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question that elements of the Government of El Salvador are strongly committed to the agrarian reform program. Many rank and file government officials have risked their lives to implement the program, and some changes have inded occurred. The judgment that must be made, however, is whether the Government has been able to demonstrate "continued progress" in this effort.

A major Salvadoran peasant organization, Union Comunal Salvadorena (UCS), which has been intimately involved from the beginning in the agrarian reform program, delivered a report to Junta President Duarte on December 10 of last year. According to this report:

The Land to the Tiller component of the program "today finds itself in danger of total collapse";

Only 2 of 300 cooperatives on large estates have been granted titles;

25,000 families have been illegally evicted from their lands;

Many campesinos and 20 of their representatives have been murdered while seeking to exercise their legal rights;

Fewer than 15,000 out of 150,000 families of former tenants and sharecroppers have received their provisional titles; only a few hundred of these titles contain a sufficiently adequate description of the land involved to be useful;

Survey data indicate that approximately 75,000 campesinos have been robbed or forced to make illegal rent payments to the former landlords;

The evictions that have occurred have been accomplished "in the majority of cases with the assistance of members of the military forces"; and

At least 90 officials and promoters of the democratic campesino organizations have died during 1981 "at the hands of ex-landlords and their allies who are often members of the local security forces."

The report concludes:

What had begun in March and April of 1980 with bright promise, and continued to show bright promise even through the end of 1980, now threatens to become a nightmare of bureaucratic red tape, evictions and killings, in which it will soon be beyond the capacity of the government or the campesino leadership to prevent a complete loss of faith by our country's campesinos in the agrarian reform program. If and when this happens, the extreme left will have free rein throughout the countryside and all prospects for ending the violence or instituting democracy will be at an end.

The UCS study included a series of urgent suggestions which, if implemented, might produce the continued progress which U.S. law requires in order to prevent the suspension of military aid.

On January 30, the New York Times reported that two UCS leaders had written a letter to a labor official in Washington in which they stated that "many of the suggestions" made in their report "have been taken into account by the Government, and, if the problems pointed out are overcome, the process will be intensified." The letter, again according to the Times, further noted "certain positive attitudes on the part of the government which, were they to be translated into deeds, might consolidate the process and contribute to a democratic way out of the Salvadoran crisis."

Mr. Speaker, this letter, combined with the December report, makes it clear that after 2 years of good intentions and positive attitudes on the part of certain elements of the Government, the land reform program remains stalled. An ugly tendency exists among some elements of the Salvadoran opposition and its supporters in other countries to respond with glee to the failures of the agrarian reform program. This is extremely unfortunate, because the agrarian reform effort is precisely the type of project which ought to be supported by the United States, and which will, if effective, do the most to bring some measure of political and economic justice to countries such as El Salvador.

Unfortunately, the Salvadoran program is not achieving its purpose. Even Ambassador Hinton admitted in a recent interview with the Washington Post that the major legal reforms proposed by the UCS are not likely to take place in the immediate future.

President Reagan's desire to continue providing military aid despite the role of some elements of the armed forces in obstructing the land reform process is not in accord with the conditions established by the Congress. It was the view of those who proposed the conditions now in law that our military aid ought to be contingent on the progress of the land reform program, thus creating an incentive for the Salvadoran military to support the reforms. Under President Reagan's policies, however, the military will receive its aid whether or not the progress occurs, and whether or not the armed forces are guilty of assisting in illegal evictions and the assassination of government officials and campesino leaders. Such a policy brought the land reform program to the brink of collapse in 1981; it should not—and will not if U.S. law is fairly implemented—be continued.

Condition 4: The Government of El Salvador must be committed to the holding of free elections at an early date and to that end must have demonstrated its good faith efforts to begin discussions with all major political factions in El Salvador which have declared their willingness to find and implement an equitable political solution to the conflict, with such solution to involve a commitment to—

First, a renouncement of further military or paramilitary activity; and Second, the electoral process with internationally recognized observers.

This condition of law is based on the premise that discussions between the major political factions in El Salvador are vital to the holding of meaningful free elections. Such discussions are necessary to create a political climate inside El Salvador within which such elections may be possible.

As the special representative of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights asserted in his October 28 report:

> The Government plan for holding elections is perfectly legitimate and acceptable if and when the electoral process takes place in a prevailing climate of peace in which the rights of free expression, association and assembly are fully respected, both de jure and de facto, a complete and genuine roll of voters is available and, lastly, the authenticity of the ballot and effective respect of the people's will are guaranteed.
> Consequently, as a sine qua non for holding elections, the Government of El Salvador and the other parties concerned should take all necessary steps to end the serious violations of human rights occurring in the country, including steps to ensure compliance with the 1949 Geneva Conventions and the 1977 Protocols. The Special Representative is not in a position to specify, in this interim report, what these measures should be, although he thinks that some of them are obvious, such as the exercise of real control by the Government over all members and units of the armed and security forces and over all types of armed organizations and individuals committing these violations, and penalties for possible violations. But the Government of El Salvador should also show itself to be open and flexible as regards any other type of measures which might lead to pacification of the country, and dialogue with the opposition forces should not be exluded from the latter measures.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of El Salvador, with the backing of the Reagan administration has consistently opposed negotiations, a dialog, or serious discussions with the Political Diplomatic Commission of the FDR/FMLN, a principal opposition group in the country. Refusal to engage in such talks has been expressed directly in statements to the public and press, through the rejection of offers by a host of international governmental, political and clerical groups willing to play a mediating role, and through the publication by the Army, last spring, of a list of 138 psychopaths, traitors and terrorists which the military declared its intention to relentlessly pursue. This list included virtually every significant member of the FDR's leadership, as well as many others, and was understandably perceived by those leaders as a sign that the Government was not interested in discussions.

No question exists that the Government of El Salvador has failed to demonstrate good faith efforts to begin serious discussions with the FDR/FMLN. The key question in terms of the law, then, is whether this group is a "major political faction" which has declared its willingness to find and implement an equitable political solution of the nature envisioned in the legislation. There is persuasive evidence that this is the case.

The Political Diplomatic Committee made numerous statements throughout 1981 which demonstrated a willingness to negotiate or engage in a dialog with the Government. The precise wording of these declarations varied during the year but the central theme remained constant.

In May, Dr. Fabio Castillo, a member of the Political-Diplomatic Committee, told a press conference that—

> The Political-Diplomatic Committee has not set any conditions. Preconditions for a dialogue and an eventual mediation would be part of the negotiations. The only condition that has been established is that the international mediation group should consist of representatives from four sectors: European democrats, the European Christian Democrats and two important independent persons—one from Latin America and the other from North America. This is the committee's proposal, of course. However, this is open to negotiation because it can be accepted or rejected. If necessary, counterproposals will be heard.

On October 1, the Political-Diplomatic Commission announced that it had developed "a very specific and concrete plan for negotiations," and urged the Salvadoran junta to enter into a dialog without prior conditions in order to discuss the possibility of such negotiations. The plan for negotiations included five points:

First. Negotiations shall take place between the conflicting sides without excluding any of our forces.

Second. The negotiations shall be facilitated by the presence of international mediators.

Third. Discussion should be of a global character concerning all aspects of the Salvadoran situation based on an agenda agreed upon by both sides.

Fourth. The Salvadoran people must be informed of the progress of the negotiations; a means must also be developed whereby the Salvadoran people have the final decision about the results of the negotiations.

Fifth. There shall be no preconditions of any kind by either side.

The October announcement included a declaration that "our two organizations, the FDR and the FMLN, have repeatedly stated that we do not reject elections. We consider elections an important instrument of popular participation." The statement also expressed a "commitment to seek a political solution to the present state of armed conflict."

On January 27, 1982, a letter from five commanders of El Salvador's armed opposition groups was delivered to the White House. This letter, according to the New York Times, suggested the initiation of talks between the junta and the opposition groups "without preconditions by any of the parties to the conflict."

President Reagan's certification incredibly fails entirely to discuss the government's unwillingness to enter into discussions with the FDR-FMLN for the purpose of creating conditions within El Salvador under which free elections may be held. On these grounds alone, Congress has a responsibility to declare the certification null and void. The evidence is clear that the junta, and particularly its military component, is not willing to seek a political solution to the conflict if this entails discussions with any group which has not previously agreed to a military surrender. The government may have what it perceives to be valid strategic reasons for adopting this posture, but the conditions contained in U.S. law require, nevertheless, a more forthcoming attitude.

The position of the FDR-FMLN toward discussions of the type envisioned by the law appears to be sufficiently explicit and cooperative for this group to qualify as one of the

"major political factions" included in the fourth condition. An even more explicit declaration, tailored with precision to the language contained in the law, would be helpful if the FDR-FMLN were truly desirous of eliminating doubts on this score. A meaningful test of the sincerity of such a statement, and of the other statements concerning negotiations which have been issued by the FDR-FMLN might then be possible, but only if the Government of El Salvador agrees, as it ought in order to remain legally eligible for U.S. military aid, to do its own part toward finding a political solution to the violence.

Condition 5: The Government of El Salvador must have made good faith efforts both to investigate the murders of six U.S. citizens in El Salvador in December 1980 and January 1981 and to bring to justice those responsible for those murders.

According to President Reagan, the Government of El Salvador has put sufficient energy into these investigations to satisfy him that "good faith" efforts have been made. Others, however, are not so easily satisfied.

Mr. William P. Ford, brother of one of four churchwomen slain in El Salvador on December 2, 1980, wrote a letter to President Reagan on January 25, 1982, in which he states:

To date, the families have not seen any evidence of a good faith effort by El Salvador to investigate the murders and bring to justice those responsible. Every indication seen by the families points to a cover-up by the Salvadoran government. At a minimum, basic decency suggests that the State Department tell the families about any progress before releasing statements to the press. I ask you not to certify to the Congress that progress has been made into the investigation, until the State Department tells the families and the American people just what progress has been made.

Mr. Speaker, making a firm judgment with respect to this condition of the law will not be easy for Congress due to the unwillingness of the administration to make detailed information concerning the investigation available. In addition, there is some question, given the breakdown of the judicial process within El Salvador, whether truly good-faith efforts on the part of Salvadoran law enforcement officials would have produced more conclusive results in the two investigations than those which have actually been forthcoming. Nevertheless, even a superficial review of the information which has been made public indicates that the pace of the investigation has responded more directly to political pressure from the United States, than from internal concern for law and justice on the part of the Salvadoran Government.

The investigation into the murders of the churchwomen, particularly, has been marked by long periods of inactivity, including 2 weeks for "Christmas vacation" less than a month after the killings occurred. The extraordinarily slow pace, and incomplete nature of ballistics, fingerprinting, and polygraph tests cannot be excused. The sum total of activity in the 14 months since the murders could have been achieved, if good-faith were truly evident and El Salvador and FBI resources fully utilized, in a matter of weeks. Instead, the case had been allowed to drag on and on, the investigation periodically pronounced dead by those responsible for carrying it forward, and then revived in response to new bursts of interest on the part of people in the United States. The latest activity, generously publicized by the State Department in recent weeks, seems to be occurring in direct response to the understanding that a certification of good-faith efforts would be required. If the requirements of law do indeed push the investigation forward, this will be all to the good. But, Congress will need to utilize a more reasonable definition of "good-faith" than the President if there is to be any real meaning in this condition of the law.

Congress must also renew its efforts to obtain detailed information concerning the investigations in order to make a truly firm judgment about the extent to which El Salvador had demonstrated "good-faith."●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. SENATE—Tuesday, February 9, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, January 25, 1982)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable MACK MATTINGLY, a Senator from the State of Georgia.

PRAYER

The Reverend Arthur H. DeKruyter, D.D., founding pastor, Christ Church of Oak Brook, Oak Brook, Ill., offered the following prayer:

Dear God and Father of us all,

We are grateful today that—

Beyond our knowledge is Your unlimited wisdom;

Beyond our weakness, Your incomparable strength;

Beyond our selfishness is Your supreme love;

Beyond our restlessness, Your unfathomable peace;

Beyond our uncertainty is Your Divine plan;

Beyond our indecisiveness are Your eternal verities.

Thank You for making Your resources available to us.

Open our eyes, our hearts, and our minds to receive the help You offer so freely.

Grant us insight and compassion in assessing the needs of our Nation, and broaden our vision to see the true needs of all mankind. Then give us a firm resolve and undaunted courage to use our abilities and talents to fulfill Your purposes first of all.

Purge us of self-serving devices. Make us instruments of Your peace, healing, and justice.

Accept our gratitude for Your faithfulness,

Your guidance, and the innumerable blessings You have given to us in the past.

We pray through the name of Christ Jesus, our Lord and Master. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., February 9, 1982.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable MACK MATTINGLY, a Senator from the State of Georgia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. MATTINGLY thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, two Senators will be recognized on special orders provided for yesterday evening. That is to say, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) and the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), in that order, for 15 minutes.

ORDER FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the execution of the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 12 noon in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, under the previous order, the Senate will stand in recess today from the hour of 12 noon until 2 o'clock in order to accommodate responsibilities of Senators to be conducted off the floor by both sides of the aisle. At 2 p.m., the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Resolution 20. At 3 o'clock, the Senate, under the order previously entered, will resume consideration of S. 951, the Department of Justice authorizations bill, on which a cloture vote will occur at 4 p.m. pursuant to the petition filed under the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate.

Mr. President, it is my intention later in the day, or later this morning, I hope, to ask the Senate to give unanimous consent that if cloture is invoked on the Department of Justice authorizations bill, and notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII, that the majority leader, after consulting with the minority leader, might lay that measure aside temporarily for the purpose of considering the resolution in connection with the proceedings against Senator HARRISON WILLIAMS. That would be necessary. Otherwise, the previous announcement made by the joint leadership that debate on that measure will begin on February 23 could not be executed unless final disposition of the DOJ authorizations bill had occurred.

Mr. President, I will not put that request at this time, but I would hope that the minority leader and I might discuss that shortly and find an opportunity to put in the request this morning.

LEGISLATIVE AGENDA

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, obviously, the schedule for the Senate for the balance of this week depends on the outcome of the cloture vote which will occur at 4 o'clock this afternoon. If cloture is not invoked, it would be my intention to resume consideration of Senate Resolution 20, the resolution authorizing radio and television coverage of the Senate. If cloture is invoked, it would be necessary under the provisions of rule XXII to continue with the consideration of that measure until it was disposed of or until it was temporarily laid aside, pursuant to an order which I hope will be entered today.

In any event, Mr. President, it is not possible for me to state the schedule of the Senate with more particularity at this point. I might say, however, for the information of Senators, that it is my hope that before we recess for the Lincoln Day break, we may make provision for the consideration of several measures that I have mentioned earlier. For instance, in addition to the Department of Justice authorizations bill and Senate Resolution 20, the radio and TV resolution, I think it is important that before or shortly after the recess we proceed to the consideration of the regulatory reform measure; the criminal code recodification; the agent identities bill; perhaps supplemental appropriation bills that have arrived at the desk or may shortly be received; the Voting Rights Act extension, and other matters that may come to my attention.

I am told now that the other body is expected to consider three of the four urgent supplemental appropriation bills, that is to say, the Commodity Credit Corporation, House Joint Resolution 389; the unemployment compensation, House Joint Resolution 391; and low-income energy assistance, House Joint Resolution 392. It would be my hope that the Senate will be in a position to deal with these urgent supplementals as soon as they are received from the House and in the context of the requirements for the consideration of other measures which I have just now described.

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY RECESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I should like to make one other statement before I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

The Senate is scheduled to go into recess at the close of business on Friday for the Lincoln Day period. It would be my hope that we could arrange the business of the Senate so that we could recess, instead, at the close of business on Thursday. That would depend on how we proceed with dispatch of the business we must do. It would be my hope that we could conclude the business of the Senate at the close of business on Thursday rather than on Friday.

Mr. President, I have no further need for my time under the standing order. I am prepared to yield to any other Senator who desires the time. I see none seeking time.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield to the distinguished minority leader such time as I have remaining.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no need for the time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield back any remaining time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield my time to the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN).

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. President, I see that my colleague from Arkansas has the first order. I ask unanimous consent to proceed since he is not here.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may proceed.

WORLD AGRICULTURAL TRADE

IV. POLICY ALTERNATIVES FOR U.S. AGRICULTURAL EXPORT TRADE

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am deeply disturbed about the financial crisis facing our Nation's farmers today. I do not believe that nearly enough people understand the stark reality of these problems, nor do they understand how closely connected they are to our lack of progress in our efforts to win a more truly free market in international trade.

In my last three speeches on this topic, I have described for my colleagues the perilous position of America's highly specialized, highly efficient family farmers and their dependence on export markets. I have discussed a leading example of the trade problems we face in the international market—the price-depressing export subsidies of the European Community. I have described how these export subsides in my view not only violate the GATT and the MTN subsidies code, but are also extremely detrimental to our national interest and result in lower prices for American farmers.

I could go on at length with many other examples of trade problems facing U.S. agricultural products as we attempt to export. We face beef import quotas in Japan, where the last increase we won amounted to only one thin hamburger patty per Japanese per year. We face beef import quotas in Europe, and the EC has made almost no increase in meat imports—a violation of their agreement to import 10,000 metric tons of U.S. beef per year. There are a host of other tariff and nontariff trade barriers and export subsidies around the world.

Those are the problems. I want to identify those problems. I want to target those problems. But what I really want us to do is to get to the bottom line—what can we do to correct this situation? What can we do to help the American farmer get a fair price for his product in the international marketplace?

Last October 1, I placed in the RECORD a letter I sent to our distinguished U.S. Trade Representative, Bill Brock, in which I encouraged him to consider initiating cases on his own motion against the EC's common agricultural policy (CAP). A few days later, Ambassador Brock responded to my letter in detail. He said among other things that the administration was taking cases on sugar and wheat flour to international disputes resolution under section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 and the GATT subsidies code, and that he would shortly determine whether to take other cases to the GATT as well. Subsequently, the administration has notified the EC of other agricultural cases it is taking to the GATT. I applaud this use of section 301 and the GATT for meritorious cases, and I will watch the development of these cases with keen interest.

Similarly, in recent months the administation has taken the initiative and pointed out to European officials the harmful effects of the CAP at various informal, high-level discussions, which resume in Washington this month.

Despite these welcome developments, I believe we should consider more aggressive use of the international disputes resolution procedures. All the cases referred to in Ambassador Brock's letter to me existed because private industry filed a petition asking for Government assistance. Some cases do not deal with U.S. exports at all, even though they call into question the CAP. That the administration would proceed with such cases is all to the good; where industry is willing to complain, section 301 provides a vehicle for registering that complaint. But that cannot be the end of it.

Industry frequently has a complaint, but does not petition. Why? One reason is that they fear retaliation which could wipe out what little trade they already have. For example, right now, many U.S. manufacturers are adversely affected by the Canadian policies on inward investment, yet they do not complain because Canada has a system of reviewing those investments that can arbitrarily wipe out a U.S. company's Canadian market overnight.

Another reason U.S. exporters do not complain is that it may take forever to get a decision. Section 301 has, until very recently, been a graveyard for complaints. The Wheat Flour case we are pressing now is 7 years old. The Citrus case is even older. Congress amended section 301 in 1979 to provide time limits for executive action. But, frankly, we left the President plenty of loopholes that enable him to avoid acting.

Finally, and perhaps most important, sophisticated U.S. exporters are wary of the GATT as an institution for resolving disputes. They have seen agreements that were not worth the paper they were printed on. In 1980, for example, a section 301 complaint by the wheat industry was terminated after the EC gave assurances it would carefully monitor its exports and use restraint in exporting to markets sensitive to the United States. Despite these assurances, the EC continues to expand its wheat markets. Total EC wheat exports increased from 5 million metric tons in 1977-78 to 10.4 million metric tons in 1979-80. Our own Secretary of Agriculture estimates that these subsidized exports cost U.S. wheat farmers 50 cents per bushel last year in lower market prices. Today, no one is sure whether the GATT can resolve the pressing trade problems that arise in the disputes settlement process.

At present, bringing a complaint under the dispute settlement provisons of the GATT or the GATT-implementing codes is regarded as the start of a trade "war" by our trading partners. They would rather deal with these problems the way they always have—quietly and discreetly—and, frankly, let our cases die in the process.

Too often, our own Government is all too willing to go along. The State Department often seems to forget that the American farmer pays income taxes, when he has any income. Those taxes pay the salaries of State Department bureaucrats who have been all too willing to try to buy friendship at the expense of the American farmer. They have forced our farmers to pay for America's foreign policy with agricultural embargoes and threats of embargoes. That purchased friendship is the most fleeting kind, and those embargoes have only led to increased agricultural exports by other countries and lower prices for American farmers.

That attitude must end. The United States should aggressively support our farmers. We should have an announced policy of identifying trade problems and bringing them up in the GATT.

When we identify a generic problem like the CAP, we must analyze where it violates international agreements, in what products or services it hurts us, and what international support exists for our position. We should consult private sector advisory committees set up under the Trade Act of 1974. Then, on the basis of such pragmatic considerations, the Special Trade Representative should start formal GATT or MTN cases on his own motion to resolve the problem.

Such a change in attitude could result in hundreds of millions of dollars in increased U.S. exports. This change in policy can be declared immediately, without any changes in law.

In suggesting such a change in policy, I should want it to apply to all our trade—not just agriculture. I should also make clear that it is not intended to destroy the CAP—only to stop its unlawful and harmful international effects from hurting U.S. farmers. This policy must also apply to all countries—not just Europe. Japan is an equally good example of severe trade restrictions against U.S. products. As a result of those restrictions, the United States had a $16 billion trade deficit with Japan last year, and it is expected to grow much larger this year.

I know that many will say that GATT cases are a waste of time, and I, too, am frustrated by all the wasted words of the GATT. But the international trade situation is desperate now; our trading partners have to understand that. I fear deeply for the world trading system if we have to subsidize our exports just to compete. I believe many parties in Europe do not want to spend $44 billion a year subsidizing agriculture when the United States spends $3 billion; I believe there are many in Europe who do not want to be viewed as unfair traders by the majority of GATT members; and I am hopeful these forces of reason can prevail in Europe if we just press our case.

Incidentally, Mr. President, one aspect of this change of policy that may require legislative action is to augment the U.S. Trade Representative's information gathering powers under sections 301-306 of the Trade Act of 1974, which are virtually nonexistent in this law. In order to have a program such as I have described, USTR will obviously need not only access to sensitive business information on prices and markets but the legal authority to protect this information. However, it may already be possible under present law for USTR to "piggyback" on other agencies' information powers or to use existing USTR authorities to accomplish this result. I await the administration's advice on whether such housekeeping powers are necessary.

Many questions remain to be asked about the problems and potential of U.S. agricultural trade, and I intend to raise them in our hearings later this week.

First. Can section 301 of the Trade Act be made a more effective remedy? Will we ever aggressively enforce our rights under trade agreements?

Second. Can we mobilize other agricultural trading nations adversely affected by EC subsidies to compel an international discussion of the problem?

Third. What remedies are available to the United States in the event the EC refuses to implement actions that will eliminate the harmful effects of their export subsidies? Do our only remedies consist of increasing prices to our consumers by raising import barriers? Must we increase our taxes so as to fund agricultural export subsidy banks? If these remedies are unavailable to us, particularly given the current economic difficulties, what can we do?

I am hopeful this hearing will help us find answers to many of these questions because, Mr. President, they are of real importance to the future of the American family farmer.

The American farmer has been told to produce for a competitive free market. He has been told the world is hungry and he must export food to feed the hungry. In response, he has become the most efficient producer of food in the history of the world. The average farmer feeds himself plus 52 other Americans and still exports enough food to feed 26 people in other countries.

Yet he exports that food at prices that are below the cost of production. These last 2 years, he has taken over a 30-percent cut in real take-home pay compared to the average of the last decade.

This is the real problem we will address on February 11. Will our farmers finally be given a comprehensive, consistent overall agricultural policy, both foreign and domestic? Will they be given access to the free markets that they are asked to produce for? Or will they continue to pay the bills for American foreign policy? Will they continue to strangle slowly under a free-market domestic policy coupled with a foreign trade policy that does not deliver that free market?

Texas has more farmers than any other State in the Nation. I hear from them, and I listen to them. And the bottom line for the American farmer is price. He does not want to use more credit—he is already in debt up to his ears. He wants a good price for his product. He wants to make a profit for a change, and I want to help him do that.

As I said at the start of these statements, Mr. President, it is time for this country to take hard look at the real world. It is time to tell the American farmer what his place in the world will be and what this Government can and will do to help him gain equal access and earn a fair price for his product in the international marketplace.

DUMPING OF BELOW-COST SUGAR INTO U.S. MARKET BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES MUST BE STOPPED

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise to congratulate the Senator from Texas, Mr. BENTSEN for drawing the Senate's attention to the problems caused by subsidized products from the European Community in his statements on trade policy and American agriculture. I would like to describe the specific hardship the Hawaiian sugar industry faces, because of the European Community policy.

Hawaii produces the highest acreage sugar yield in the world with the lowest number of man-hour per production unit. Nearly a quarter of a million acres in Hawaii are planted in sugarcane. The Hawaiian sugar industry employs 9,100 people directly and indirectly supports the jobs of another 20,800 workers. It is the third largest revenue producer for the State of Hawaii.

The Hawaiian sugar industry today faces severe problems. The current market price for sugar is 13.4 cents a pound; during the past year that price has been even lower. Despite the efficiency of the Hawaiian industry, its cost of production in 1981 averaged 25.5 cents a pound. With its cost of production exceeding the market price, the Hawaiian sugar industry incurred $100 million in losses in 1981.

The economic straits have led one company to close its sugar factory temporarily. Another company has announced the permanent closing of a plantation which would idle 500 workers and take 16,172 acres out of production. To help the industry to survive, 7,500 organized sugar workers have agreed to postpone scheduled wage increases, because of the current situation.

The predicament is directly attributable to the subsidies every exporting country provides to its own sugar growers. This predicament is especially attributable to the 27 cents a pound European Economic Community price guarantee to its sugar producers and subsequent export subsidies paid to its sugar exporters.

The United States imports 45 percent of its sugar needs—about 4½ million tons a year. Up until 1975 the European Economic Community also imported sugar for its domestic consumption. Now, however, due to its heavy subsidy, the European Economic Community exports sugar and in fact dumps sugar onto the world market at prices below the cost of production and below European Economic Community guaranteed price levels.

The Hawaiian Sugar Planters Association has supported a complaint under section 301 of the 1974 Trade Act. But the existing procedure to negotiate an end to the European practice has proven too cumbersome and time consuming. The relief finally obtained for our domestic industry, if any, may well come too late to save many American farmers.

Throughout the period from 1978 to 1981, countries which abided by the International Sugar Agreement (ISA) held back their sugar exports to stabilize prices. But the European Economic Community, which is not a party to the ISA, expanded its heavily subsidized exports to capture 20 percent of the world market in 1981.

For the current season, it is estimated that world sugar production will increase by 10 percent. A fifth of that increase will be due to heavily subsidized European Economic Community sugar. The European Economic Community will likely raise production by 1.9 million tons, a 15-percent increase from last season.

European Economic Community production, clearly in excess of European Community domestic needs will be dumped in third country markets. The effect will be to lower world price generally, divert the production of other countries to the United States, and further injure American sugar producers.

All major sugar exporting countries—Cuba, Brazil, Australia, South Africa, the Philippines, Argentina, India, Mexico, as well as the European Community—have a guaranteed set price for their sugar production. The guaranteed price of the European Community and other exporting countries is far different from the U.S. loan price program. Our program sets a distress price, intended to save the American farmer from greater loss. By contrast, the European Economic Community sets a price which assures its growers a handsome profit. Furthermore, the United States is the only major sugar producing nation that provides a semblance of a free market for this subsidized foreign sugar.

The hardship faced by the Hawaiian sugar industry, along with American agriculture generally, is the cost the United States pays in support of a free trade policy. The increased hardship we are being forced to bear under a seemingly one-way free trade policy leads me to question severely the fairness of our present trade policy to our ownselves.

The problems faced by Hawaiian sugar growers is just one more example of the many cases which support the point raised by the Senator from Texas. I, for one, hold him in high regard and that regard is strengthened by his knowledgeable and forceful exposition on the European Community common agriculture program. Unless the situation can be corrected by mutual agreement between the European Economic Community and the United States, within a reasonable time, we of the Congress should take steps to stop the dumping of Government-subsidized farm products, including sugar, into our domestic market.

U.S. FARMERS HURT BY EUROPEAN COMMUNITY POLICY

(By request of Mr. BENTSEN, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) for allowing me to join him and others in pointing out the gross inequities that exist today in the international agricultural marketplace.

As a member of the Senate Finance Committee's Subcommittee on International Trade, I share the sentiments of my colleague from Texas that the United States needs to toughen its stance on agricultural trade issues. Mr. BENTSEN, as a cochairman of the Senate Export Caucus, is a qualified spokesman for the American farmers who face trade barriers in their export markets.

I have just returned from Japan where I discussed trade issues with the Japanese Secretary of Agriculture and other high-ranking Japanese officials.

I believe that the hearings—scheduled for February 11—for the Subcommittee on International Trade are essential in bringing out the inequities that I discussed with the Japanese leadership.

I realize that the trade barriers presented by the farm subsidies within the European Community are an equally alarming hindrance to free trade. I would like to thank the distinguished chairman of our subcommittee, Mr. DANFORTH, for holding these hearings to develop a U.S. response to the EC situation.

FARM BILL BASED ON MYTH

Mr. President, the 1981 farm bill, supported by the Reagan administration, favored a free market approach to improving farm prices over providing reasonable domestic supports. In a truly free market, I think U.S. farmers would agree with this approach. American farmers prove, year after year, that they can produce high quality products with greater efficiency than any other country in the world.

Why is it, then, that the U.S. farm economy is as poor as it has ever been?

I personnally believe that we have put the cart before the horse. We keep domestic farm supports at low levels and throw U.S. farmers to the international marketplace. But the corrections that need to be made in the world market have not taken place. U.S. farmers suffer the burden of low prices until positive action is taken to eliminate trade barriers and move us to a truly free international market.

I voted against the 1981 farm bill because I believe we should have worked on these trade inequities before exposing U.S. farmers to the marketplace. I believe that we now face a much more critical situation—that must receive our prompt attention and action.

EC—COMMON AGRICULTURAL POLICY (CAP)

Mr. President, Europe's CAP was instituted in 1962 to promote the Community's self-sufficiency and provide European agricultural workers with incomes equal to that of other workers. This was to be done by offering high internal price guarantees by using variable levies to keep import prices higher than domestic prices.

As a result, the EEC is about to join the ranks of major agricultural exporting nations.

The CAP has proven to be a very expensive program. A World Bank study indicates agricultural price distortions in France, Germany, and the United Kingdom may have cost the consumer around $6.5 billion in 1976. This cost has undoubtedly grown substantially since then.

The hearings this Thursday will specifically address the EC's CAP. I see three reasons why the United States should be upset.

First, the European Community appears ready to expand its export policy using many objectionable features embodied in the CAP, such as long-term agreements and increased export credits.

Second, we are having trouble getting the Europeans to reform their export safety valve, which they use to take care of excess production. They are also reluctant to bring their internal prices more in line with world prices.

Finally, our traditional access to the European market is in danger of being limited by their protectionist measures.

Mr. President, the subsidies under the CAP are totally out of line with U.S. farm prices. For example, the 1981 loan rate for wheat is $3.55 per bushel in the United States. At the same time, the EC's intervention price for wheat is $4.90 per bushel. This $1.35 per bushel spread is alarming enough—but the intervention price means that all the wheat produced in the EC will be purchased by the European Community at $4.90 per bushel. That is a far greater direct government subsidy to farmers than we even considered during the 1981 farm bill debate.

REFORM THE CAP; LOOK TO JAPAN

Mr. President, in fairness to U.S. producers, the CAP of the EC must be reformed. I am pleased to join Senator DANFORTH, Senator BENTSEN, Senator LONG, and a number of other Senators in calling for a review and reform of the CAP. The United States must vigorously defend our GATT rights by utilizing section 301 and every other available means to correct the inequity that continues to hurt U.S. farmers.

I ask that a recent letter I received from the Secretary of Commerce, Malcolm Baldrige, appear in the RECORD at this point. The letter outlines the U.S. efforts to date.

The letter follows:

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D.C., January 8, 1982.

Hon. MAX BAUCUS
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAUCUS: Thank you for your letter concerning the EC Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) and its effect on international trade.

During high level consultations in Brussels December 11 and 12, Secretaries Block and Haig and Ambassador Brock expressed U.S. concerns about the effects of the CAP to their EC counterparts. The U.S. side made it clear that we will defend our legitimate trade interests and that we will not tolerate the EC using export markets as a means to dispose of the chronic overproduction resulting from the CAP's operation.

The United States has already taken a number of steps to translate our position into concrete action. During 1981, the United States initiated consultations pursuant to the dispute settlement procedures under the Subsidies Code against the EC with respect to its exports of wheat flour, poultry, sugar and pasta. We have also initiated consultations pursuant to the dispute settlement procedures under the GATT against CAP practices with respect to canned peaches, canned pears and raisins. In each of these cases, the United States is alleging that the EC is violating its international obligations under the Subsidies Code and the GATT as a result of various CAP export and domestic subsidies. We will continue to explore all legitimate multilateral and bilateral forums to press our position in this area.

Import restrictions on grain substitutes proposed by the EC in July were also discussed in Brussels. U.S. access to the EC market for these products is assured by international agreements. Any attempt to impair this access would strike at the very foundation of our trading relations with the EC. The United States is not alone in opposing any kind of import limitations on these products, but receives strong support from numerous other countries.

The Brussels consultations helped to clarify EC understanding of U.S. concerns about the effects of the CAP. While I was not able to attend the Brussels meeting, I wholeheartedly support the efforts of my colleagues. A follow-up meeting will be held in Washington in February to continue the discussion of this and other policies affecting our relations with the EC. We will continue to impress on the EC the need to adjust the CAP so as to reduce, and not exacerbate, tensions in U.S.-EC trade relations. Thank you for your support in this endeavor.

Sincerely,

MAC BALDRIGE,
Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. President, I also want to express my desire that the United States simultaneously address the inequities of Japan's trade policy. Despite Japan's recent agreement to ease trade restrictions on 67 of 99 items in question, there has been no change in their agricultural import policy.

I stressed the need for change in my recent visit with Japanese leaders and I reaffirmed my commitment to this change through letters to the U.S. trade negotiator, William Brock, and the Japanese Ambassador to the United States. In these letters, I stressed that we should not be satisfied with the Japanese announcement until serious attention is given to the lowering of agricultural export barriers.

I hope that the Subcommittee on International Trade will continue to address the barriers we face in international trade with a close look at the Japanese situation. I plan to continue my effort to see that U.S. farmers can compete fairly in a free international market that allows them the opportunity to receive a price that meets their cost of production.●

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to intervene for the purpose of putting a unanimous-consent request, without it being charged against the time allocated to the Senator from Arkansas under the special order?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—S. 951

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I indicated earlier in the day, I wish now to put a unanimous-consent request dealing with the Department of Justice authorizations bill and the consequences of cloture, if cloture is invoked, as it may relate to another matter. I believe this has now been cleared on both sides.

I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII, if cloture is invoked on S. 951, the Department of Justice authorizations bill, such measure may be temporarily laid aside at any time after February 22 by the majority leader, after consultation with the minority leader, to proceed to consideration of Senate Resolution 204, a resolution to expel Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, JR., from the Senate.

I further ask unanimous consent that no call for the regular order serve to take Senate Resolution 204 off the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair, and I thank the Senator from Arkansas for permitting me to do this.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BUMPERS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

COMPETITIVE LEASING

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, there is more discussion than usual these days about balancing the Federal budget or at least reducing the enormous Federal deficits we seem to be facing. There is much talk about eliminating inefficiencies and waste and fraud in Federal programs.

In my opinion, one of the most colossal cases of waste and, at times, fraud is the outdated system the United States continues to use in leasing its Federal oil and gas lands.

If we really want to balance the budget, or at lease increase revenues in a very fair way, this system would be an absolutely excellent place to begin.

A recent oil and gas lease sale in my State of Arkansas, which requires competitive bidding, shows by comparison just how outdated the Federal lottery system of leasing its lands is.

This past December, Arkansas leased 80 acres of mineral interests which it owned in the Ouachita National Forest. The Federal Government owned the surface but Arkansas owned the minerals.

The important feature of this lease, Mr. President, is that we had enough sense in Arkansas to demand a competitive bid for the resources that belong to the people of Arkansas. As a result of leasing that 80 acres on a competitive basis, we received a bonus of $103 per acre.

If that same acreage had been leased by the Federal Government, it would have been let on a first-come, first-served, noncompetitive basis and would have yielded the United States only $1 per acre, or $80, in annual rent. So, the State of Arkansas, for its 80 acres, received $8,240, and the Federal Government, had it held the mineral rights as it does on more than 700 million acres of land, would have received the magnificent sum of $80.

Under the existing Federal leasing system for on-shore oil and gas, only 3 percent—I repeat, 3 percent—of the leases are sold competitively. Regardless of the fair market value of the tracts, the remainder of the tracts are leased noncompetitively for an annual rental of $1 per acre.

The lease is issued for 10 years without even an obligation to drill. Perhaps the best way to appreciate the potential revenue loss to the Treasury under the system can be found in some figures that have been given me by the U.S. Bureau of Land Management.

In 1980, the average revenue per acre generated by competitive leases—competitive leases—was $86.23 per acre, and the average revenue generated by noncompetitive leasing was only $6.01 per acre.

I think we should note that of the more than 20 States in this Union that have oil and gas within their borders only 1, 1 out of 20, Wyoming, still issues oil and gas leases on a noncompetitive basis, and even Wyoming has begun to require competitive bonus bidding on some of their tracks.

The reason that people in the State agencies which administer these leasing programs have given my staff and me is very simple: It is fair and the States know they are getting the fair market value for their mineral interests. The recent lease sale in Arkansas which so dramatically illustrates the weaknesses of the Federal program, and the revenue which is being lost, was brought to my attention by a forest service manager. This civil servant certainly did not fit the common stereotype of the wasteful bureaucrat. In describing the lease sale to my staff, he emphasized how frustrating it is for him personally and his associates to know that the Federal Government could be getting much more revenue from the oil and gas resources of the Federal lands if the antiquated noncompetitive leasing system were abolished.

Mr. President, the Arkansas lease sale is not just an isolated example of the disparity which exists between the value of our oil and gas resources and the price that the Federal taxpayer is now receiving for them.

Nearly everyone in the Senate has heard me describe a lease sale at Fort Chaffee, Ark., which first piqued my curiosity and got me interested in this subject.

In 1979, 33,000 acres at Fort Chaffee, which was surrounded by a producing gas field, was leased by the Department of the Interior for $1 an acre. Later, because I raised so much cain about that sale, land in that same area was leased competitively. Twenty-four thousand acres in the same area as the land that had been leased for $1 an acre were put up for lease on a competitive basis. And what do you think it brought? Eighteen hundred dollars per acre. Some of it brought $4,007 per acre. And If I had not been squealing like a pig under the gate every bit of that land would have gone for a dollar an acre.

The argument is always made that eliminating the existing noncompetitive leasing system will some how prevent small and independent companies from being able to obtain leases. This charge simply is not supported by the records of either State lease sales or the small percentage of Federal competitive lease sales. The Bureau of Land Management reports that more than 80 percent of the leases issued by competitive bidding are typically won by small and independent companies. This is particularly significant since these competitively issued leases are for tracts that have the highest potential, and so should be of greatest interest to the major companies. Furthermore, State lease sales show that independents compete very well with the major companies in obtaining competitive leases. More than 90 percent of competitive leases recently issued in Montana went to independents; in Texas, nearly 80 percent of competitive leases recently issued in 1981 went to independents; in New Mexico, more than 80 percent of leases issued in 1980 were obtained by independents.

Mr. President, I have focused on the financial weaknesses of the existing noncompetitive leasing system. Let me add that my criticism of the system is not limited to its revenue inadequacies. I simply do not feel that the Federal Government should be in the business of conducting lotteries to determine who gets the right to drill for valuable oil and gas deposits.

Mr. President, I promise you if you took a poll of the people of the United States 90 percent of them would agree with that proposition.

The oil and gas lottery was suspended for several months in 1980 because of the discovery of widespread fraud and manipulation of the system.

I do not believe in lotteries. When I was Governor of my State I told the gamblers, "Do not come to me with any proposal for lotteries or any other gambling devices. We are not going to have it in our State." And I still feel the same way, especially after coming to Washington and finding that the only thing we really own of value, our resources, is being peddled by simple lottery.

And the tragedy is that even in the lottery system the vast majority of the people who win leases are not oil and gas people. They are people who are retired, living in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. They are people who live all over the country. And they are enticed to invest in this lottery system by over 250 corporations that have sprung up around the country and do nothing except tell people how they can get rich if they will just submit a bid in the lottery system.

Almost without exception the winners of the lottery turn right around and sell their winnings to an oil company. The winners most always sell the lease to a company for a handsome profit. So what we actually have is a competitive system—but the competition only begins after the United States has given a lease to a lottery winner, and the real proceeds go to that winner—not the U.S. Government.

Mr. President, legislation that would have cured and corrected this situation and established an all-competitive leasing system was reported out by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee in 1980. Unfortunately, the Senate did not have time to act on that bill before adjournment.

Last year I introduced similar legislation S. 60. In December I brought it up in the Energy Committee as an amendment to the oil shale leasing bill and I lacked 3 votes getting it out of the Energy Committee.

But I wish to serve notice on everyone in and out of the Department of the Interior, in and out of the Bureau of Land Management, and in and out of the Senate that I am going to offer this legislation at every opportunity I get because I know what we are doing is wrong. Our present system is subject to fraud, it is an invitation to speculation, and it is financially disastrous for the American taxpayer who is being asked to cinch it up and who is now being told that the deficit just for this year alone will be over $90 billion.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 12 o'clock in which Senators may speak.

PERSECUTION OF CHRISTIAN PENTACOSTALISTS REINFORCES NEED TO RATIFY GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, many times I have decried the anti-Semitism extant in the Soviet Union. Today, however, I wish to discuss another case of religious persecution there.

Christian Pentacostalists in the Soviet Union also have been harassed for many years. According to Parade magazine, since the Stalin era Soviet authorities have engaged in an unsuccessful campaign to stamp out the Pentacostalists once and for all.

Although Soviet law requires that their congregations be registered, it is believed that over 200,000 Pentacostalist are defying this order. The tension has grown to such proportions that as many as 20,000 of them, according to Western estimates, have applied for emigration visas.

The so-called Siberian Seven stands as the most publicized case of Soviet animosity toward Pentacostalists. The two families called the Siberian Seven, the Vashchenkos and the Chmykhalovs, fled Soviet authorities by forcing their way past Russian guards to enter the U.S. Embassy in Moscow in June 1978. They have now lived in one 15- by 20-foot room in the basement of that building for 3½ years. They are, in essence, trapped there with little hope and much fear.

Soviet KGB affiliates are employed in the compound to perform most of the manual labor. According to Parade—

> Some of the workers delight in taunting and harassing the Seven, who often are afraid to leave the relative safety of their room without an American escort.

On one occasion, a guard constructed a flammable cotton ball, lit it, and tossed it into their room.

To call attention to their case, one of the Seven began a hunger strike at the end of last year. After more than a month of fasting the American officials at the Embassy were left with a decision between two horrible alternatives. They had to choose between letting her die and turning her over to the repressive Soviet authorities. On January 30, fearing for her life, they sent her to a hospital. Now in Soviet hands, she most likely faces arrest, force feeding, and transfer to a psychiatric hospital. For all intents and purposes, she has been lost. The ordeal of the remaining six drags on.

The plight of the Siberian Seven merely spotlights the terrorization of Christian Pentacostalists by the Soviet Government.

The Soviet persecution of Christian Pentacostalists is but one example of a religious group being tormented in the world today. Although it is not a clear case of genocide itself, this example does remind us of the possibility of such action.

The humanitarian voice inside us all cries out to help the oppressed. What better place to begin than at the top of the list, with the cruelest and gravest violation of human rights—genocide.

We have had before us for more than three decades now the International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. It is imperative to support this worldwide treaty declaring genocide an international crime. Let us delay no longer in ratifying the Genocide Convention.

ADMINISTRATION PROPOSALS ON NURSING HOME SAFETY: A STEP BACKWARD

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today I rise to express my grave concern over a plan of this administration's which would, if implemented, have a dramatic, negative effect upon our Nation's institutionalized elderly. I am specifically referring to efforts to deregulate the nursing home industry, while simultaneously federalizing the medicaid program and making additional precipitous benefit reductions in both the medicare and medicaid programs.

While I am certain that most nursing homes attempt to provide their residents with the best possible care, the history of nursing homes in the United States is clouded by the incidence of scandal and abuse. Frightening stories of patient mistreatment including physical and mental abuse have been well documented through newspaper accounts and congressional exposés. During my days in the House of Representatives I personally witnessed a serious lack of care and unbelievable living conditions in many homes.

Through the efforts of a small group of concerned and committed individuals, and through many years of struggle against almost insurmountable odds, we have been marginally successful in establishing some minimal standards for long-term care facilities. In the late 1970's we were further encouraged by what appeared to be a movement toward even greater safeguards for nursing home patients. In 1980 the Carter administration proposed an overhauling of nursing home regulations which would have provided greater patient protection, while eliminating some unnecessary and burdensome reporting requirements. These proposed rules were subsequently withdrawn by the present administration.

And today, we are now faced with the unfortunate prospect of a complete about-face on Federal policy toward protection of the more than 1¼ million nursing home residents in this country. As a part of its overall deregulatory efforts, the Department of Health and Human Services is currently circulating in-house a draft set of conditions for participation in the medicare and medicaid programs for skilled nursing facilities which could greatly reduce basic health and safety safeguards for residents.

Among the current standards and conditions which are in jeopardy are the following:

First. The requirement that each facility maintain a medical director to be responsible for the care of patients. This minimal requirement was established after a long history of epidemics and malnutrition pointed to the need for centralized responsibility for overall patient care, in addition to requirements for individual physicians.

Second. The condition requiring the provision of medical social services, and the condition requiring a program of activities to improve the physical, social, and mental well-being of the patients. The combined elimination of these two requirements could have a catastrophic effect upon patient health and act as a strong disincentive to deinstitutionalization.

Third. Requirements for the development of personnel policies and procedures and staff training. The need for training and education of personnel, particularly unskilled and nonprofessional staff, in dealing with the very special needs of nursing home residents has long been established, particularly in the areas of prevention and control of infections, fire prevention and safety, accident prevention, confidentiality of patient information, and preservation of patient dignity, including protection of his privacy and personal and property rights. All of these training requirements are currently scheduled for repeal. It is absolutely ludicrous, it is unbelievable, and it is inhumane. Rather than the elimination or downgrading of such requirements, I strongly advocate even more stringent requirements in this area of patient protection.

Fourth. Standards requiring hygiene of staff and sanitary conditions, under the present proposal, would be seriously jeopardized.

Mr. President, these are just a few of the draft proposals which have caused me considerable alarm. But taken in conjunction with President Reagan's most recent proposal to federalize medicaid and further reduce medicare and medicaid benefits, these changes should cause concern and outrage in every U.S. citizen.

The Federal Government initially became involved in the regulation of the nursing home industry because of the rampant abuses to which our senior citizens were subjected. Now the President has asked that the Federal Government take over the full expense of the medicaid program, 40 percent of which goes toward nursing home expenditures, while giving control of the industry back to the States. Question: Who will guarantee the rights of this most vulnerable population?

In addition, under the new proposals for medicaid, the administration intends to allow States added flexibility in the recovery of long-term care costs. Specifically, States will be able to charge adult children for partial reimbursement of medicaid costs for their institutionalized parents, as well as permitting the States to place liens against the house or other real property of medicaid recipients in long-term care facilities.

Mr. President, in addition to causing potential family resentment toward the institutionalized, these provisions all but guarantee that, even should a nursing home patient have some hope of being deinstitutionalized, the draining off of this individual's lifetime resources will dash all hopes of once again becoming an active member of his community. But beyond these points, the threat of such action will most surely cause the cruelest type of mental anguish to our Nation's elderly—the threat of loss of all independent means through no fault but that of aging and becoming unable to fully care for oneself.

Mr. President, I will conclude my remarks by urging my distinguished colleagues to closely monitor, with me, the actions of this administration with regard to our institutionalized elderly. These are the individuals who have worked to help make our country great, and we must not abandon them in their hour of need.

CALIFORNIANS AND THE BILATERAL NUCLEAR FREEZE BALLOT INITIATIVE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, there can be no more important issue in the world today than the effort to curb the mindless growth of the nuclear overkill capabilities possessed by the United States and the Soviet Union. But the vital question remains: "How do we accomplish this essential goal?"

The Reagan administration has chosen to link renewed progress on strategic arms control with improved Soviet respect for other Western interests. The Reagan administration continues to adhere to the erroneous assumption that strategic arms control is a favor we confer on the Soviet Union, rather than an overarching security imperative which we must pursue because of our mutual interest in survival.

In light of this administration's view, concerned grassroots community groups are becoming active throughout this country to try to spur more realistic arms control policies which recognize our security interest in controlling and reducing the superpower's nuclear arsenals. Nowhere is this movement better organized, more effective, and in more responsible hands than in my home State of California.

Californians concerned about the nuclear arms race have coalesced around a proposal to place on the November 1982 State ballot a referendum calling for the President to propose to Soviet leaders negotiation of a bilateral, verifiable freeze on nuclear weapons production, deployment and testing. Adoption of this proposal would signal the strong concerns of a majority of citizens of the largest State in the Nation—and the President's home State—and hopefully help spur the administration to act.

Last month, I was privileged to join my colleagues LARRY PRESSLER and CLAIBORNE PELL to hold unusual field hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in California. We heard testimony from a cross section of concerned Californians, including Mr. Harold Willens, campaign coordinator for the freeze intiative, whose testimony I am submitting for the RECORD today.

As I told the witnesses in these California hearings, it is my personal belief that it is a civic obligation of all thoughtful citizens to familiarize themselves with the details of the nuclear arms race.

We need to know how and why we got where we are today if we are to escape our current dilemma and halt what many fear is a drift toward nuclear confrontation.

The Soviet Union has 7,000 strategic nuclear weapons which it could launch within hours, most of them within minutes, and utterly destroy every American city and town with over 5,000 people.

The Soviets have 240 cities with populations greater than 100,000. Two American submarines could utterly destroy each and every one of these Soviet cities—and thus destroy the Soviet Union as a functioning society, within minutes. We have 15 such subs on patrol at any given time. We also have 1,053 intercontinental nuclear missiles based in the United States which can reach Soviet targets. And hundreds of bomber aircraft. Plus thousands of nuclear weapons in Europe.

Of course, the Soviets have their overkill, too. And they are aggressively adding to their arsenal as are we.

The question is how do we stop this spiraling overkill arms race while protecting our national security and the security of our fragile planet.

The initiative taken by thousands of Californians to place a nuclear freeze referendum on the 1982 State ballot represents to me a desire to express the public will that the arms control process be hastened and intensified—that a freeze be put in place from which to achieve reductions.

I do not usually become involved in State referendums.

But I feel compelled by the importance of this issue to say, "Yes, I too believe we need to negotiate a balanced, verifiable freeze—and indeed reductions on United States and Soviet nuclear arsenals."

I understand that one can reasonably argue over the details. Will the United States be able to remedy percieved imbalances in the European theater? Will replacement of aging and dangerous nuclear systems with more modern, secure systems be permitted? These and other questions spring to mind.

But these are issues for United States and Soviet negotiators to resolve.

On the fundamental principle of a negotiating a balanced, verifiable nuclear freeze my own view is clear: we need it and we need it soon. So I personally will vote for freezed referendum.

Mr. President, during the recent Foreign Relations Committee hearings in California, we received a remarkably clear and effective call to conscience from a remarkable American, Mr. Harold Willens. A prominent industrialist and a concerned, active citizen, Harold Willens did much to move forward the citizen effort to bring our troops home from South Vietnam. Now he is focusing his efforts on an even more important goal—to do all he can to help halt the superpower arms race.

I commend him for these noble efforts on behalf of peace, sanity, and the freeze initiative and ask unanimous consent that his testimony be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT TO THE U.S. SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

(Presented by Harold Willens, campaign coordinator)

Senator CRANSTON, Senator PRESSLER, ladies and gentlemen: The Senate, faced with decisions on national survival, has to wonder why people in California—top state in the weapons industry—are calling for a Freeze on nuclear weapons. Who are we, you may ask. What's happening here? You are giving me a chance to explain and I thank you.

What is happening, here and all over the country, is that the American people are starting to see things in a new way. There are signs of a new thought pattern—a chance as basic as the switch from seeing the earth-as-flat to seeing the earth-as-a-globe. Scientists would call it a paradigm shift. It is what Albert Einstein asked for and feared might never come. "The unleashed power of the atom", he said, "has changed everything except our way of thinking—and thus we drift toward unparalleled catastrophe". A growing percentage of Americans now feel the increasing speed of that drift.

What is this new paradigm? Its foundation is security, as in the wording of our Freeze initiative: "The safety and security of the United States must be paramount in the concerns of the American people". Nothing new there.

But the switch—the new paradigm—is the realization that in contrast to all prenuclear weapons, the more devices of thermonuclear destruction we have, the less secure we are. And the danger grows every time another country follows the United States and the Soviet Union into an ever-widening circle of nuclear-armed nations.

The new paradigm sees the same facts as the old, among them the fact that the Soviets are catching up and may even now equal the United States in destructive capability. But it sees this new constellation of facts as demanding the shift to a realization that neither nation can gain safety and security by threatening the safety and security of the other. Like global siamese twins, we either live together or die together. And now, when both nations are at the same level of destructive capability, we and the Soviets have an opportunity—an opportunity we may never have again—to back away from our collision course by means of a bilateral nuclear arms Freeze.

A glimpse of this paradigm shift can be perceived in the nation-wide Gallup poll of last June. It showed 72 percent of Americans as saying, "We want an agreement between the United States and the USSR not to build any more nuclear weapons". That is hardly a mandate, only a new consciousness, like a child struggling to be born. We of the Freeze are like midwives trying to help it, feed it and toughen it for the world of politics. We are doing that through a campaign designed to produce ballot box proof of a citizen mandate; which is something Congress has always responded to.

That kind of citizen—mandate is urgently needed now. In the last few years the Congress has failed to challenge—or even seriously debate—the so-called "countervailing nuclear strategy" concept which has crept into the picture and which represents a fundamental and fearful change in policy.

It is a change from MAD to WORSE. MAD (mutually assured destruction) can be achieved with several hundred U.S. and USSR thermonuclear devices. As small a number as that can effectively destroy both nations. Since there are now about 50,000 in our combined arsenals, those who want still more are forced to invent fantasy scenarios and smokescreen slogans to conceal what common sense would otherwise reveal; the counterproductive consequences to our national security and our economic security, that flow from putting our money where our myths are. As I said, the Congress has failed the American people by failing to debate this distortion of the term "deterrance". That is why the California campaign we are launching assumes particular significance.

Who are we? We are industrialists, scientists, doctors, ministers, even defense workers—citizens from all walks of life. I am a business executive who, as a U.S. Marine intelligence officer happened to see both Hiroshima and Nagasaki not many weeks after those two cities were leveled at the dawn of the atomic age. What I did not see, until much later, was that those two American atomic devices changed forever the nature of war. Other business executives are Victor Palmieri, Leopold Wyler and many more. We have dozens of top scientists, including Herbert York (former head of Livermore Nuclear Weapons Laboratory) and five Nobel Laureates. Dr. Jonas Salk is one among our group of distinguished medical people. Religious leaders who have endorsed the Freeze include Cardinal Timothy Manning, Archbishop John R. Quinn, Fuller Seminary President David Allan Hubbard, Rabbi Joseph Asher and the Rev. Thomas Kilgore.

But mainly, and by the thousands, we are ordinary citizens listening to people like Marvin Goldberger, who I see is here to testify before you. A powerful argument for the new paradigm lies in the fact that Jerome Wiesner, for many years President of M.I.T. and Dr. Goldberger, President of Caltech—that these two leaders of our Nation's two greatest centers of scientific and technological learning, both favor the Freeze idea.

For years we have been told that we the people are unable to pass judgment on this issue because we cannot understand the technical factors involved. But here we have the heads of the two top technical institutions saying that more nuclear weapons bring us less national security. It is hard to imagine a clearer warning that it is time for a review, a re-assessment of policies based on the vain effort to gain nuclear superiority. These two scientific leaders—along with many others—are telling us to reject the tunnel vision of the old paradigm.

They—and we—are urging President Reagan to propose a bilateral nuclear weapons freeze. By that we mean a US/Soviet agreement "to immediately halt the testing, production and further development of all nuclear weapons, missiles and delivery systems in a way that can be verified on both sides".

What chance is there he will do this? Fortunately the President has already signaled a possible shift. On November 18 he announced a new alternative: START—Strategic Arms Reduction Talks.

He said his aim for START is "definite verifiable reduction of strategic nuclear weapons". We think that idea could save the nation. No future event should be allowed to downgrade or postpone it; no "linkage" should be allowed to block it. START is non-partisan, basic; it could become the prime goal of a once-more-united American people. And if we can get the President to initiate START with the Freeze, we think it is an achievable goal. But without the Freeze—and the history of past negotiations shows this—without the reduction of tensions that the Freeze could bring, the President's "definite verifiable reduction" will prove impossible.

START and the Freeze, hand in hand, could rewrite arms control history. They could halt the nuclear arms race and win for Ronald Reagan a permanent place of honor in our Presidential hall of history. For no longer would there be the extreme tension, the strategic stalling, the cut throat bargaining-for-advantage. No longer would negotiators have to fear the momentum of their opponent's science and technology. The Freeze would have taken care of it. No longer would there be a relentless race in the background to wipe out all gains. The tone, the attitude, the very goals of START negotiators would be different under the Freeze. Tension reduction would make possible arms reduction—and survival.

There are questions, to be sure. Question number one is: What would your Freeze do to our intermediate-range-missile negotiations in Europe? Don't we need to threaten the Soviets with deploying our Pershing IIs and cruise missiles there? How else will we get them to remove their SS-20's? Aren't you in favor of the President's goal of saving Europe from nuclear war?

The answer is Yes, we are. We support him heartily in that. And we support his further goal: saving the United States from Nuclear War. But the best means for reaching these goals, we feel—In Europe as well as here—is the President's START program, plus the Freeze. The problem is global and requires a global solution. First we must reduce tensions with the Freeze and actually start cutting back on strategic weapons. Then the problem of negotiating the safety and security of Europe will have been made much simpler.

The second question is what about the Soviets. Would they go for a Freeze? And could we trust them not to cheat? Take the cheating first. The word is verification, not trust. Verification of SALT compliance by means of photo-reconnaissance satellities, seismographs and radar was the subject of the Senate Armed Services Committee hearings in July 1979. General David Jones, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was asked, "Do you believe we can adequately verify the SALT agreements?" Yes, I do," he said.

That yes applies even more to the verification of the total halt of nuclear weapons activity in a Freeze. Totality wipes out ambiguity and makes verification easier.

Regarding Soviet acceptance of a Freeze: They fear annihilation as much as we do. Every year since 1976 they have made Freeze-like proposals at the U.N. Perhaps this was only propaganda, but why not find out for sure by proposing a Freeze of our own?

And now to the economic impact of a Freeze. Let me start with a quiz:

Question: How many video-tape machines were bought in the last three years?

Answer: About 2 million.

Question: How many of those 2 million were made in the U.S.?

Answer: None.

Question: How many were made in Japan?

Answer: All 2 million.

Question: Does this result from Japan's being free from the technical brain drain and dollar drain of the nuclear weapons race?

I can't prove that, but Japan's competitive edge in video-tape, TV's and cars makes me wonder. Certainly a Freeze on our nuclear weapons production might help. The enormous sums of money saved would cut the budget, cut interest rates, cut inflation and cut the national debt—all at the same time.

That, and putting the thousands of nuclear weapons scientists and engineers back into private industry, would surely help us become competitive in the world markets once again.

The American people—ourselves included—want adequate and sufficient national security. We are entitled to that. But where is the sense in spending money that does nothing at all to improve our safety? Civil defense, for example, is a wishful fantasy. The most highly qualified scientific and medical experts—those whose fees and salaries are not involved—prove beyond doubt that the destructive power of today's nuclear annihilation devices will transform any so-called shelter into a crematorium whose occupants would quickly perish. The countless billions diverted for such "shelters" would damage our economy and add nothing to our security.

This is the kind of information our campaign intends to communicate to the people of California and the people or our country, thereby shaping the realization that in addition to threatening the ultimate holocaust, a nuclear arms race also does severe damage to our economic viability.

The paradigm shift to which I have referred is nothing more than the application of common sense to the one potentially terminal problem of our time. Two hundred years ago Thomas Paine published a pamphlet called "Common Sense". Because, in the words of George Washington, it "worked a powerful change in the minds of many men". "Common Sense" became a crucial catalyst in the movement that led to the birth of our nation. The death of our nation can be prevented now if that same kind of citizen common sense can be brought to bear upon our political process.

The common sense that citizen Tom Paine promulgated in 1776 is the same common sense (the paradigm shift) that we hope to promulgate in 1982 through a national citizen movement that starts with the California Bilateral Nuclear Weapons Freeze Initiative.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for morning business has now expired.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12 o'clock noon having arrived, the Senate will now stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 12 o'clock noon, recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. LUGAR).

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, what is the pending business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will resume consideration of the pending business, which the clerk will state by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 20) providing for television and radio coverage of proceedings of the Senate.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the Senate resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is anticipated that we will proceed on this resolution for no more than 1 hour. Senators have not yet reached the floor to attend and participate in that debate. In the meantime, and for the moment, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have not yet spoken on the issue which is pending before the Senate in regard to whether or not proceedings of the Senate should be covered by radio and television.

It is my feeling that history demonstrates there is a direct correlation between political accountability and confidence in government by our people. In my opinion, it is time now for us to follow the precedent that has been established by the other body with regard to making the proceedings of the Senate available to the broadcast media for coverage and for reporting to our constituents.

Mr. President, I am mindful of the long and tedious debates on the floor of the Senate that pertained to the Alaska lands bill. When that bill was before the House, it was covered by the air media, and the people in my State of Alaska were very familiar with what occurred in the House.

As a result of the bill coming to the Senate and the proceedings in the Senate, and the misunderstandings that came from the way the proceedings were reported here, I think there is still a resentment in my State in the way the Senate handled the Alaska lands bill. That resentment would not be there, in my opinion, had we had the type of coverage that the other body had of their proceedings.

We are not perfect. I am mindful of what the distinguished Senator from Arizona said yesterday. There is a lot of merit in what he said.

On the other hand, in terms of the coverage of the activities of local governments in Alaska, which by the way are called boroughs, not counties, the local governments are covered adequately by radio and television. Our State legislature now has at least portions of its proceedings covered by television, using satellite coverage to report to the people of Alaska.

I think it would be a good thing if the proceedings here in the Senate could be reported home as timely as those that have been reported home from the House of Representatives. I say that being cognizant of some of the difficulties that may ensue once we proceed to modernize.

It appears to me that it is time that we thought about the mechanisms of this coverage and how we can handle it to insure that there is some recognition of the workload of the Senate floor in terms of substance as opposed to the procedural activities. The House has the Rules Committee and, accordingly, the Rules Committee determines the procedures used on the floor of the House in deliberations. We do not use that procedure. I would estimate that about one-third of the time I have been on the Senate floor, we have been concerned with the procedural activities of developing the schedule of how we are going to handle substantive matters. I think the procedural activities probably ought not to be involved in the coverage because there are negotiations on and off the floor, which involves reaching unanimous-consent agreements and discussing the handling of particular matters. I think what the public wants to see is how we handle the substantive decisions, not how we make the arrangements to handle them.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I am happy to yield to my good friend.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would like to ask a question based on what would be my principal objection to televising the Senate.

We have experienced television in committee after committee and we have seen what happens when that little red light goes on. We start to ask questions ad infinitum and we make speeches.

I remember during the Panama Canal debate a Member of this body spoke for over 6 hours because it was covered by radio. This Member had never in my memory spoken more than a half hour or 45 minutes.

If you put that television camera someplace around here it will take him 6 hours to introduce a bill.

That is my objection to it, I say to my good friend from Alaska. We do not get enough work done in this body now. To expose ourselves to the vagaries of television I just cannot believe would help the operation of the Senate.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. STEVENS. I say to my good friend from Arizona that I am hopeful as this resolution proceeds there will be consideration given as to how to answer some of the questions the Senator from Arizona has raised and others have raised to me personally about their feelings on this issue.

It is not that there is an opposition to the coverage; it is the question of whether the coverage, per se, is going to lengthen the proceedings in the Senate and whether the impact of the coverage will lead to a misunderstanding of really what the Senate's work is all about.

As I said in referring to the House Rules Committee, we certainly do not want to be forced to change the procedures in the Senate and establish the Senate Rules Committee to operate in a similar way to the Rules Committee in the House. That is contrary to the traditions of the Senate. On the other hand, I contemplate a control mechanism to be established to determine the allocation of time on a daily basis, to deal with the time when the coverage will be commenced and when it will terminate in terms of the coverage of the substantive issues before the Senate, not of the procedural discussions that lead to time agreements and the long discussions we have in relation to procedures.

What I have in mind is sometime offering an amendment which would set up a protection against a filibuster being waged against the allocation of time, the so-called fast track consideration, so that a majority of the Senate can at any time determine what is going to happen.

As a practical matter, these problems will resolve themselves, once the procedure is established, to management by the leadership, having checked with both sides of the aisle in terms of setting a daily calendar to determine who is going to participate and really control the time. Normal traditions of the Senate would be followed with regard to yielding, as I see my good friend from Arizona wishes me to do again. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator has made a point there. I would like to remind my friend that down through the years we have been attempting to make it possible for this body to accomplish more work in a shorter time. I only think of the work we have done under rule XXII. Now I only have to look at the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to see the insertions we have made instead of reading them or making a speech. They have a little black dot by it. I call it a blob.

Mr. STEVENS. It is a bullet.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The public does not know what that is there for. And we still do not get our work done.

Now if the Senator from Alaska is suggesting that we may have to develop new rules to further limit a Senator's opportunity to speak, I think we are watching the slow destruction of the great strength of this body, the fact that anybody who has the courage and the stamina can stand up here and defend his State or defend his principles. If we are going to start saying, "Now you are interfering with the television procedures and the public is not going to like listening to you all day," we are going to watch this Senate slowly rule ourselves out of the constitutional strength that we have.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the Senator from Arizona misunderstood my comment, which was I believe that on a daily basis we could determine how the time is going to be controlled. We do that for 90 percent of the time on the floor of the Senate anyway, through time agreements, through the understandings we have with managers of the respective bills. We know who is going to speak, and we usually know the order in which they are going to speak. We seek to determine that as we manage bills.

I would not impose any restrictions on the Senator's time for speaking nor on the Senator's right to participate in extended debate. Rather, that would be part of the calendar. We would know it in advance. I think the press knows it in advance already, anyway.

I perceive that there is opposition to this resolution based on the fact that we do not have a generally known management plan that is sort of spread out in advance. I think we could do that. We could have a little more orderly presentation of what we already know.

Perhaps the Senator did not know it, but the leadership knew I was going to come here and make a statement at 2 o'clock. I believe that, usually, a Senator who is going to seek the floor to make a statement notifies someone that he would like to be heard.

Once in a while, there is a spontaneous presentation of views by someone who has something in mind, to make a statement. Usually, the manager of the bill knows who is going to speak and almost in what order.

All we need is to get an understanding of how that is going to be managed, and we should not have the question of a filibuster once the lights have been turned on.

I agree with the Senator. I have been at committee hearings, and when the lights are turned on, things are different. When they are turned off, the proceedings continue. We can expect a sort of aberration—the moths are attracted to the flame. But that becomes old, too, after a while, I say to the Senator from Arizona. I think the other body had that experience in the beginning. It seems to me that now, at least from what I watch on my set that monitors the House, the other body is a little more restrained in its activity.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield. I see that the other Senator has left the Chamber. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I ask the distinguished Senator if this is not correct: Under the existing rules of the Senate, as a practical matter, any Senator has the opportunity to speak as long as he wishes to speak, if he protects his rights. While a Senator may seek a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate and to get on with the business, any Senator can say, "I object"; or he can say, "If you are going to get the unanimous-consent agreement, you will have to let me have 2 hours to speak." However, more often he will say, "If you are going to have unanimous consent, I insist on having 2 hours to explain my views on the subject."

Is it not likely that once we have a substantial TV audience, that might be the situation? If a Senator knows that a lot of people in his State are viewing the debate, does it not stand to reason that he will stand up and make a speech to advise the folks back home about the matter, in a way that would tend to appeal to the people back home in the hustings?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not doubt for a moment that that is going on in the other body and that it will happen here, too. On the other hand, I know people who make statements on the floor for that purpose today. They make a statement so that it will get attention throughout the country.

The question is, Should we be limited to the printed media? Should we be in the situation where only those invited up to the television and radio gallery really get the exposure in the other media?

I believe there is a basic fairness here, in terms of opening up the Senate proceedings to the air media.

On the other hand, there is a potential for harm to new Senators and those who do not know our procedures. At the time I came to the Senate, I was the majority leader of our State legislature, and I thought I knew parliamentary procedure pretty well, but I had to learn it all over again.

I will never forget when we were in a discussion concerning an amendment I had. The manager of the bill said, "I have another amendment. Let me go first, and then we will see what the Senate does with yours."

He did not exactly mislead me; but his amendment was in the second degree, and once it was adopted, mine was shut off.

That sort of thing on television will not help a young Senator, and we will have to have a few protective devices to prevent some of the games that might be played once we are on television. I hope the Senate will determine those and that there will be a new type of courtesy developed in terms of managing bills and assuring fairness with respect to the offering of amendments and the consideration of them.

Again, the fairness of this resolution is that it allows millions of Americans to see what now is only available for people in the gallery to see.

I can recall days when bills that affected my State were concerned, and down came busloads of people from Pennsylvania and Delaware and even as far as Illinois, but not many Alaskans got here. They did not know what was going on with respect to bills that affected them, and only them, on the floor of the Senate.

I think the Senator knows that my State is probably afflicted by that more than any other State—having a lot of people trying to run Alaska from the U.S. Congress. I believe that people sometimes misunderstand the comments and the reports that come to them.

I should like them to watch what goes on here, as they can watch what goes on in the House. It may be that it will be good or bad for this Senator. I do not know.

The Senator from Arizona remarked about that. I note that my hair is becoming a little thinner and I am becoming a little more paunchy. Perhaps it will not be as good for me as when I came to the Senate, at age 46. That is part of the system, too. If we have to shine our shoes, as my friend has said, and get our hair cut and put on a blue coat—I did that today—and a blue shirt, that is not all bad; because the people in the other levels of government have been doing it for a long time. I do not know why we should be an immune area.

Why should there be a mystery about Senate proceedings? I debated with myself whether this was a good idea or not. The more I thought about the Alaska lands bills, the more I was convinced that there is still a mystery at home about what went on here.

They read about the proceedings on and off the floor, for example. We got into arguments and had points of order, and people went off the floor to try to settle it, and we came back in the Chamber. I believe that a great deal of the mystery would have been dissipated if they had been able to watch it.

There are issues here that are of concern to particular areas of the country, and not everyone can listen to what is going on, unless they are on the eastern seaboard and can come to the gallery and listen. That is a nice thing. I do not at all begrudge the opportunity of our citizens to sit in the gallery. But I wish Alaskans could learn a little more about it.

Perhaps it is being a little selfish, but it might make my job easier to get the word to them a little earlier, if possible.

I came down on the point that with all its drawbacks—I believe the Senator from Arizona has good points, as does the Senator from Louisiana—if you add them up, there has to be a plus if the Senate modernizes and recognizes that the air media is there, too.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is part of the leadership, and many times he stands here as the acting majority leader and seeks to steer a program through the Senate and manage the Senate as it conducts its business. Can the Senator from Alaska foresee the prospect of another Senator coming to him when a bill of significance to that Senator's constituents is in the process of being scheduled and saying to him, "I want the opportunity to speak on this matter before the U.S. Senate, on live TV, between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock at night, because that is prime listening time back in my home State; and unless you can arrange for that, I am going to keep this debate going until I have that opportunity?"

Mr. STEVENS. That is why I should be put in charge of the scheduling.

In Alaska, we have five time zones. Our first starts with the west coast and goes on to Adak—five different time zones. If we wanted the people of Adak to know what was going on here, we would have to arrange to be in session at 2 o'clock in the morning, so that we could have it at prime time, at 6 o'clock at night there.

No one is going to talk to me about prime time, because there is no chance for prime time in Alaska.

On the other hand, the replay can take place in Alaska, just as anywhere else. I will never listen to anyone who tells me he wants recognition at a particular hour because that is when it is going to hit the news broadcast at home.

Frankly, except on the few days I can recall when we were in session beyond midnight, it could never hit my prime time.

Mr. LONG. Was the Senator here when Senator Wayne Morse was with the Independent Party and would object to any unanimous-consent agreements unless he had his way? Sometimes the Senator would take the floor and speak for 5 hours to the people of Oregon. He was not on television at that time. What kind of stiuation would we have if he were on television? He would feel that here was the opportunity to report to the people on television.

With respect to the Alaska lands bill, especially if it were not going too well, a Senator could be on the floor day in and day out.

I am glad the Senator mentioned the 5 hours. I can see the prospect of a Senator from Alaska—not the present Senator from Alaska, the assistant majority leader—but I can foresee some Senator from Alaska, present, past, or future, standing on this floor and using up the entire 5 hours of prime time in Alaska, and in all that time, the Senate could not be voting.

I can just picture the prospect of a strong Senator from Alaska who is publicity conscious and one who knows that this is seen back home. Can the Senator not see how a Senator can reelect himself here, with the Alaskan lands bill getting the worst of it. All he has to do is say: "Let me tell you folks out in Alaska, call all your friends and neighbors and tell them your Senator is holding this floor fighting their battle for them. Nothing important will be said during the next half hour while you call all your friends and neighbors and get down to cases."

Can the Senator not see the telephone calls going across Alaska? And they will tune in:

"Here I am, your Senator. I am going to hold this floor as long as necessary."

He can just be talking here.

"My good people of Alaska in Adak. Let me tell them. By now it is now 2 o'clock in the morning. Here in Washington I am fighting your battle here for you."

Of course, there may not be many people in Adak. You can be sure if the Senator is effective, and I do not mean effective here, I mean an effective spokesman, as most politicians tend to be, those people in Adak will appreciate that. Here their man was at 2 o'clock in the morning Washington time holding this Senate in session to make his case about the Alaska lands bill.

The Senator recognizes that is a distinct possibility, does he not?

Mr. STEVENS. This Senator recognizes that as a distinct possibility.

I also recognize the possibility that Alaskans as well as other Americans can soon tell the difference between a show horse and a workhorse. As a practical matter it is what you accomplish in the long run, not what you say. And in my opinion, it is possible that there will be a Senator from Alaska—as a matter of fact, it is possible there may have already been one—and Senators from other States who would have done that. But I do not think they would be here very long

As a practical matter, I know the Senator does not want me to be facetious about it, but as a practical matter, it really in the long run does not matter whether this opportunity is available here because I can remember Senators, when the opportunity was not available on the floor, who took their business off the floor in order to get television coverage, and so has the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS. I promised to yield to the Senator from Maryland here a minute.

Mr. GOLDWATER. This question can be answered quickly. It has not been touched on, to my memory.

How much will this cost?

Mr. STEVENS. It is my understanding it is going to cost between $3 and $4 million.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is closer to $8 million, is it not?

Mr. MATHIAS. No.

Mr. STEVENS. How much does it cost the House of Representatives?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not have any idea. But it costs too much.

Mr. STEVENS. How much is our latest building costing us for a place to meet with our constituents?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Way too much. I voted against it.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes. I voted for it.

But as a practical matter, I say to the Senator, the problem is there is not anything we can do to modernize that does not cost money, and $4 million or $8 million is a lot of money, but in terms of the benefit to society of removing some of the mystery of what makes the Senate work and what the Senate is all about, it is worth it. I had occasion the other night again to look at the movie "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." Does the Senator remember that one?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Oh, very well.

Mr. STEVENS. It is a great movie, but there are a lot of inaccuracies and a lot of misleading things as to what really goes on in the Senate and how a newcomer can have an impact on the Senate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That was a long time ago.

Mr. STEVENS. It is still being shown on the midnight movies. One has to have a new baby to understand that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I understand.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, let me answer the question of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, let me yield to the Senator from Maryland for the purpose of responding to the Senator from Arizona. I wish to wind up my comments in a moment.

Mr. MATHIAS. The cost as estimated by the Architect of the Capitol is $3,934,000. The Sergeant at Arms estimate is $3,062,000, which does not include labor for installation on the cost of a new audio system.

Since that time, as the Senator from Arizona knows, because of his interest in the technology of communications, there has been an actual reduction in the cost of some of the modern equipment, and we believe now that the cost would be below $3.5 million for installation. The labor to operate annually, which is a consideration, we estimate to be about $200,000.

Let me just add one or two further thoughts very quickly because they are short answers to questions raised by the Senator from Arizona.

No. 1, there is nothing in this resolution that affects the rules of the Senate. There is no impact on the rules of the Senate or alteration of the rules of the Senate under this resolution.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I am not worried. First of all, I am not saying I do not believe the Senator. I do believe the Senator. But I do not think that $3 million is going to cover the installation of television equipment here, but we can debate that further. I am not worried about the fact that there is no language in here that changes the rules. There has been no language in any legislation since I have been here that suggested a changing in rules, but by golly, that is about all we do is change the rules.

Mr. MATHIAS. Let me make available to the Senator the detailed estimates, and if he can show where they are wrong in any respect, it will be a great service to us.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will be very happy to.

Mr. MATHIAS. The final thing I wish to say: The Senator is concerned that this will extend the hours in which the Senate is in session. I believe I heard him say that to the Senator from Alaska.

The short answer to that is that in the House of Representatives, in the three sessions in which they have had television, they have been in session for fewer hours than in the preceding years.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator overlooks the fact that in the House of Representatives they already have limited debate and they also have to get over the Rules Committee. Now we do not have that.

Mr. MATHIAS. They had that before they had television. Since they have had television, they have been in session less hours than before.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I realize that, but we are talking about an entirely different body. I maintain that the strength of this body and the strength of each one of us is our ability to stand up and argue at any length we care to about what the subject is or is not. I defy anyone in this body to argue differently, if they have ever sat in a committee and watched that little red light come on and lo and behold we have a whole room full of Daniel Websters just going full blast. I can see 100 Members of this Senate just watching that old black box and all of a sudden the red light is on and off they go into the wild blue yonder.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, as I said, I listened with interest to the comments of the Senator from Arizona and I have great respect for the Senator from Louisiana, and I believe they are trying to protect the traditions of the Senate, and I think those of us who support this resolution are also.

The difference is that we have a television-radio facility downstairs. After we finish making our comments here, we can go downstairs and cut a tape and send it home.

I do that quite often, cut radio tapes, television tapes, and we send the messages home.

I have a little trepidation over the concept of television and radio because as the Senate knows, I am inclined to raise my voice a little bit and I also abhor prepared statements and believe that we should do a lot more in terms of thinking on our feet. And, that is going to be dangerous once this is changed. There is no question about that because there is no chance, as someone pointed out on a news broadcast on Sunday, to correct the record once you have said it. It is going to have some impact, and we have all, I think, exercised that prerogative of a Senator rather liberally at times.

I can remember sometimes when it was for the good of the country that we did and other times when it was it may have been more questionable. I have seen words deleted from the record that were uttered in the heat of passion of debate, and I have seen others changed to reflect what a Senator intended to say compared to what he actually did say.

But there is nothing magic about this change. What is really going to happen, however, it may clean up our act a little bit. I do not find that too bad.

Mr. President, I think when you look at it on balance, as I said, weighing the good and the bad, not only on a personal perspective, but on a national perspective, the age of radio and television has been absorbed into the very remote areas of my State. There is not a village or an area of Alaska now that does not have one or the other, and we are trying to get television throughout the whole State.

And if the time has come when television has reached Alaska then I think it is time that the Senate of the United States realize that that media is here to stay.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona raised the question of the Panama Canal debate. I think that it is an interesting subject for speculation. The Senator from Arizona is not the only one who thought about television in connection with the Panama Canal debate. In fact, I am sure the Senator from Louisiana will recall, as I do with great affection, the late Senator from Alabama, Mr. Allen, a distinguished Member of this body.

Back in October 1977, when the Rules Committee was considering radio and television broadcasting of the Panama Canal debate, Senator Allen—and I pause to see if the Senator from Louisiana will not agree with me that he was, of all things, a traditionalist in the Senate; he believed in the traditions and precedents of the Senate—recommended televising the proceedings, and it is really worth quoting exactly what he said:

I do feel, though, that this issue, the Panama Canal Treaties, is of such overriding importance and the people are so concerned about the action that the Senate will take on these treaties, that we might well make an exception in this case.

And to quote Senator Allen more fully, he was profoundly concerned that television of the Senate be on a gavel-to-gavel basis. He went on to say:

I might state that I have not been a supporter of the idea of televising Senate proceedings. I have felt that anything less than gavel-to-gavel coverage would not be fair. At the same time, I recognize that gavel-to-gavel coverage might not improve the Senate's image a great deal, as Senator Hatfield suggested. But still, if it does not improve the Senate's image, that would be the Senate's fault rather than the fault of televising the proceedings.

Finally, from that same period of history, I recall a colloquy between Senator Allen and the present Majority Leader, Senator BAKER.

Senator BAKER said:

Mr. Chairman, if the Senator would yield to me, your suggestions about not reading, about not having staff at our elbow, and the other suggestions that have been made this morning—I think that if they are a sample of what would occur in the Senate as a result of this [television] resolution, adopting it, that this one thing would do more toward returning the Senate to its role and character as a public forum than anything I know of.

Senator Allen replied:

I certainly agree.

So I am glad that the Senator from Arizona has today raised the question of the Panama Canal Treaty because it did trigger this recollection of Senator Allen's views on the subject, and his views as one of the great traditionalists of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. MATHIAS. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Is it not true that Senator Allen was certainly at that point speaking for the popular side of the issue? Was it not true that those who were voting for the Panama Canal Treaty had the tough burden of statesmanship? They had the difficult burden of defending the position and casting a vote for a treaty that was not popular. A vote that would cost them among their supporters back home. But, on the other hand, a vote that they thought would have to be made if this Nation was going to live in peace with its neighbors.

Might I say to the Senator that it is nice to stand out here with one thing when he has got the popular side of the argument and talk about why all this ought to be on television. Imagine a Senator taking a position that tends to be rather unpopular, the tough side of the issue, and stands here and says: "Look, we must do this because to fail to do this means that we would fight wars that should be avoided." His example of statesmanship would not be helped by television. Frankly, the public does not—generally speaking it does not—want somebody to compromise. They want to see their side win. But, of course, that type of feeling is also the kind of thing that gets us into wars that might be avoided.

May I say to the Senator that when you look at the question of statesmanship versus expediency, I would be curious to know where does the television in the Senate tend to promote statesmanship?

Mr. MATHIAS. Well, I find myself in complete disagreement with the Senator from Louisiana on that score, and there are some great lessons in history to be said on this very point.

I believe that Winston Churchill became the towering figure that he was, not just in Great Britain but throughout the world, because he did not shrink from coping with, from grasping, the unpopular issue and discussing it in public. He did not shrink from telling the British people that they had had a military defeat on this or that or the other battlefield. He did not shrink from giving them the bad news, if bad news there was. I believe that was one of the elements of Winston Churchill's greatness. It is the hard arguments and unpopular arguments, the difficult arguments, that need to be explained to the people.

That is the very issue on which television can be helpful because if you have to deliver bad news, if you have to make a tough argument, it is better to make it face to face; it is better to look the American people right in the eye and explain exactly what you mean.

People get confused and lost when the arguments are vague, when they are fuzzed over. It is the tough arguments that ought to be made on television. Anybody can give good news; anybody can be the bearer of glad tidings. That is not a tough job at all. It is the messenger who has to bring the bad news, and who does it well, who is the important servant of the State.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MATHIAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The standard distinction between statesmanship and expediency is that expediency thinks of the next election; statesmanship thinks of the next generation.

Now, where one has the burden of carrying a debate and trying to persuade Senators to a position that is not going to be popular, is not going to be a popular position, he can speak all he wants to, he is not going to persuade the majority to his viewpoint. But if he thinks that is best for the generation and the country, that is the position to take at any time, I would be curious to know, how does television promote that?

Mr. MATHIAS. I think that television will give an opportunity to a thoughtful Senator, such as the Senator from Louisiana, to take a hard issue, one that is important to the Nation, perhaps especially important to his region, and to explain it in a way that the country will understand, not filtered through the mind and the pen of some reporter who may choose one or another of the Senator's more colorful phrases to emphasize. Instead, the Senator can speak directly to the country, putting his own emphasis on the points he feels are the important points.

I believe that television will make it an easier job for Members of the Senate to take on the tough issues, to explain them candidly and clearly, and I think it may be its greatest utility in that respect.

Oh, all of us like to give out good news. We do not find that tough at all. We can do that through the printed page, we can do it on the telephone or do it in a letter. But to explain the complex and tough things is admittedly not easy and, therefore, to have this additional means of discussing the complex and the tough issues will, I think, be an advantage to the body politic and the general welfare.

The Senator from Arizona asked a question about the cost of a television system. That is discussed in the committee report, but to make those figures more conveniently available to Members of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the cost estimates be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the cost summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. Res. 20—Cost summary—$3.5 million to $4 million

Architect of the Capitol estimate:
TV equipment	[1] $3,468,000
Labor to install	350,000
Total TV	3,818,000
New audio system	116,000
AOC total	3,934,000
Sergeant at Arms estimate:
TV equipment only (does not include labor to install or new audio system	[1] 3,062,000
Labor to operate—annual	200,000

[1] These are list prices as of mid-1981.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I did not know that there was a quorum call in process. I walked in and nothing was happening. I looked up and I did not see two lights, and I was just going to ask my friend from Maryland how that would look on television.

Mr. MATHIAS. When the Senator from Arizona appears on the floor it always looks good on television or otherwise.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I know. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I have just learned that under a previous agreement this matter will not be on the floor beyond 3 o'clock today; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, let me emphasize again that I have no grievance about this matter, none whatsoever, even though I do not think there is a more important matter than this that will come up any time soon. I reiterate the emphasis I put on things here last week when I spoke on the resolution and emphasized greatly not only my respect for the Senator from Tennessee but my admiration for him, my respect for him as a floor leader, and just say regardless of party or anything like that we just have not had a better one. His knowledge of the Government is very fine indeed.

When it comes to the matter of opening up a new mechanical arrangement in the Senate Chamber and have television at the command and disposal, almost endless disposal, of a Member or more than one Member or all of us together, just turn it over to them, under our rules of liberal time and related matters, that is a horse of another color. I made the point last week that if we are really going to do that, we better reform some here first and restore this Chamber to a real parliamentary proceeding and real parliamentary debate pattern of operation, where laws are passed and policies are debated and adopted or rejected and the affairs of our great country, now over 220 million people, are regulated.

I meant there that a person does not like to be known as a complainer—I did not mention the word "complain"—but I have been here and have seen this body as a parliamentary debating forum deteriorate greatly. I make no apologies for using that word.

I related the other day that I thought we should abolish the practice of having the Presiding Officer presiding over the Senate and talking on the telephone at the same time. I think we would have to abolish the pattern here, while the Senator is trying to address his fellow Senators, that we keep the well cleared down here in front. I am having to look over the heads of the two highly respected people that I do not know to get to see the Presiding Officer. And those are not things that ordinarily happened a few years ago with this body. I have no complaint particularly, I am just observing these things. You have to have an atmosphere of debate and consideration, respect, and curiosity in wanting to learn more about a matter to get the membership in here.

I remember once—I do not want to be going back to something all the time—as a new man here and trying to learn, a Senator was making what I thought was a mighty good speech. I heard one of the so-called senior Senators say to another one—may I have the attention of the Chair now? Clear out the well down there, if you will, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The well will be cleared.

Mr. STENNIS. The senior Senator said to the other senior Senator, "Does he know what he is talking about?" referring to this newer man. And the response was, "He usually does." And the first one said, "Well, I will stay and see what he says." So I said to myself that that is one of the unwritten rules; you are supposed to know what you are talking about if you make a speech here and want to be heard.

Now that is a mighty good rule. And I found out that most of the speeches then, if they were written out at all, were composed by the author. And a great many of them were not written out, though, anyway, just spoken from their mind and their heart, their self-discipline and self-control. And we would have 20, 30, 50, 60, or 70 Members here for a major part of the session.

Now, Senators are not altogether to blame for not being here. Times have changed—the volume of work mainly. The volume of work has gone up tremendously. As I said, there were 73 rollcall votes, recorded rollcall votes, the first calendar year I was here, and in a recent year, 2 years ago, 2 years ago, we had 703 rollcall votes recorded.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, but let me outline this for the Senator.

The year that just closed—I looked it up—it is right close to 600—594 I believe it was—showing the volume of work.

We had an appropriation bill here. The Senator from Louisiana and I used to work on it together some. It was for the Department of Defense, the largest department, just a couple of years ago. I was handling the bill and got interested in it and asked them to count up the number of what we call line items, separate items. There were 3,300 line items in that one bill; 1,630 differences in the language of the House bill and the Senate bill that went to conference and had to be adjusted and arranged and brought back here in uniform with the same words with the House.

I just mention those things. That is where the Senators are mostly here. But the point is, if we are going to modify and have a new system here of having debate, put it on television, we better first build up an audience here that will give it a background of respectability and sentiment of debate and order and procedure.

Talking about what the people like, I do not think the people of my State would like the idea of thinking that the laws that they have to live under were passed here while a discussion was being made just to a group of empty chairs; or the Presiding Officer, as I say, talking on the telephone. I made the point here one day. I told the Chair, "The Chair is out of order talking on the telephone here." I do not think people from Alaska or any other State—our good friend was referring to Alaska—would be very happy over that.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator a question. Considering the way it has been going for the last 2 or 3 weeks around here, if the Senate were on television and the public was watching this, would not the public have a very poor impression? I honestly think it would be an unfair impression of the Senate. The public would gain the impression that nobody cares, nobody is interested, when in fact, as the Senator knows, his speech is being piped into the offices. These are people in the various Senate offices hearing what is going on. In addition to that, his remarks are being taken down by the reporter. They will be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. A great number of people read that CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and consider what the Senator has said, certainly a considerable number who are not present to hear the Senator speak.

So, if the Senate is on television and you are going to show it as it really is, it is going to project the true image of the Senate unless someone is there to explain how we do business. A large part of the work of the Senate does not take place on this floor. Substantial work is done in drafting sessions, hearings, committee markup sessions, and meetings.

Mr. STENNIS. Well, I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Please understand, I am talking about the day-to-day situation, where only a few Senators are here. Where other Senators have something else to do with their time which claims even a higher priority than hearing a speech that day.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator very much. We have only 2 minutes here until the Chair will call for the regular order of another bill.

But let me raise this point now in that time: Where is the need for this change? Who wants it? Who has petitioned for it? Who has discussed it? Where is the need?

I do not feel it or hear it or see it. I have not heard anybody give an explanation that there is a real need in helping carry on the business to have these television cameras in here. Now what is the demand about this problem that it be solved in this way, if there is a problem?

As the Senator just said, everything is open; everything can be heard. I know we have gotten into debates here by surprise at 1 o'clock in the morning—not a filibuster—and the Senate would fill up right away. The galleries would be overcrowded and the press would all get here in a few minutes. So there is no new need or new sources of need to cover what is going on.

I want to say something later about the provision in this resolution as now written that gives the Rules Committee—however wonderful they may be—control over all the proceedings by television once this is in.

Mr. President, if this was not a matter of vital concern affecting the whole country and the needs of this body, the quality of the arguments here, the quality of the whole debate, I would not be so concerned about it. Let us go back to the idea of reforming and getting our house in order, trying hard to do that, and then consider this matter as to whether or not we are going to have television.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AUTHORIZATIONS, 1982

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 3 p.m. having arrived, the Senate will now resume consideration of S. 951, the hour between 3 p.m. and 4 p.m. under the rule being equally divided and controlled by the majority leader and the minority leader or their designees.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, with the time to be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the role.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous conset that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. SCHMITT). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is my intention to designate the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) to control the time on this side when he arrives on the floor. He is not yet in the Chamber. The Senator from Arizona wishes to be recognized to speak. I now yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. the distinguished Senator from the great State of Arizona, my neighboring State, is recognized.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Chair.

CONTROL OF FEDERAL COURTS RAISES BASIC QUESTIONS

Mr. President, the pending legislation, and related measures which include provisions to curb all or a portion of judicial jurisdiction over social issues, such as busing, abortion, and prayer, raise serious questions of a constitutional and historic nature.

Whatever our viewpoints may be on the various social issues as a matter of policy, there are fundamental principles involving the separation of powers doctrine and independence of the courts that must be balanced against our feelings about busing or whatever the immediate subject is.

There is no question but that the framers once rejected granting Congress the power to limit Federal trial court jurisdiction of cases arising under the Constitution, which includes most cases addressing social matters. On August 27, 1787, in the final weeks of the Constitutional Convention, by a vote of two States for and six States against, the delegates disagreed to language reading:

> In all the other cases before mentioned the judicial power shall be exercised in such manner as the legislature shall direct.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is another matter. Article III, section 2, provides that the Court shall have appellate jurisdiction "with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."

Even here, it is arguable whether Congress can allow general review power by the Supreme Court in specific classes of cases and then chip out narrow areas of these subjects solely for reasons of social policy.

A related question is whether Congress can accomplish, by means of its power over appellate review, actions affecting constitutional rights which it could not achieve directly.

Mr. President, the legal questions about the power of Congress to control the jurisdiction of U.S. courts could be debated endlessly. Putting aside these legal and technical questions, we must go on to another question, which is whether or not it is wise and enduring policy to say that the Federal courts are forbidden to use certain kinds of remedies in cases properly brought before them or are denied jurisdiction to consider this or that social issue.

The separation of powers concept runs through each and every provision of the Constitution. Alexander Hamilton writes in the Federalist Paper, No. 78, that:

> There is no liberty if the power of judging be not separate from the legislative and executive powers.

Hamilton continued by writing that:

> The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited Constitution, which he defined as a Constitution which contains certain specified exceptions to the legislative authority.

The Bill of Rights, for example, provides exactly such limits on the Congress.

So, Mr. President, what we are talking about today is not just a subject relating to a controversial issue that confronts schoolchildren and their parents at this moment of our history. The real question runs far deeper and affects the essence of our basic constitutional doctrines. This is why I will have more to say on this subject at a later date.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I observe the Senator from Connecticut is on the floor. I designate him to control my half of the hour permitted for debate on this measure.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I designate Mr. JOHNSTON to control the half hour that is under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have two unanimous-consent requests. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed with these requests, with the time to be charged equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER TO HOLD HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 389 AND HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 391 AT THE DESK

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 389, an urgent supplemental for the Commodity Credit Corporation, and House Joint Resolution 391, an urgent supplemental dealing with unemployment compensation, be held at the desk pending further disposition when received from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER TO PROCEED TO THE CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 389 AND HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 391

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII, if cloture is invoked on S. 951, such measure may also be temporarily laid aside by the majority leader, after consultation with the minority leader, to proceed to the consideration of each of two supplemental appropriations bills, one being House Joint Resolution 389, dealing with commodity credit, and the other being House Joint Resolution 391, dealing with unemployment conpensation.

I further ask unanimous consent that no call for the regular order serve to take any of these supplemental appropriation bills off the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AUTHORIZATIONS, 1982

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a cloture motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on S. 951, the Department of Justice Authorization Bill.

J. Bennett Johnston, Edward Zorinsky, Russell B. Long, John C. Stennis, James Abdnor, Don Nickles, Mack Mattingly, Walter D. Huddleston, Jennings Randolph, William Proxmire, Dennis DeConcini, Steven D. Symms, Lloyd Bentsen, David L. Boren, Jesse Helms, and Jeremiah Denton.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum call be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I have four parliamentary inquiries which I now direct toward the Chair.

The first is that after cloture has been invoked on a matter what standards does the Chair apply in determining whether amendments are germane or dilatory and whether motions are dilatory?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The book of Senate procedure states as follows:

In 1977 during the consideration of measures under cloture, the Vice President ruled that the Chair was required to take the initiative, under rule XXII, to rule out of order amendments which are dilatory. Previously, during the consideration of the same legislation, the Chair has ruled an amendment out of order on his own initiative as being dilatory; the Senate later sustained the ruling by a vote of 77 yeas to 3 nays.

With regard to germaneness, the standards for germaneness are whether the amendment restricts the effect of the bill, in which case it is germane; whether the amendment is a sense-of-the-Senate resolution, in which case it is germane. If the amendment expands the effect of the bill or introduces new subject matter it is not germane.

Mr. WEICKER. Excuse me. Will the Chair repeat the last?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the amendment expands the effect of the bill or introduces new subject matter it is not germane.

Mr. WEICKER. The second parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on the first inquiry?

Mr. WEICKER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, my inquiry is this: Is it not a fact that under the rules and the precedents no amendment is permitted if it is dilatory and the precedents hold that motions and amendments which otherwise may be legal under the rules if done with a dilatory intent or effect would, therefore, be out of order as being dilatory? And I invite the attention of the Chair in that respect to the precedents which have held, for example, that motions to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, to call for a quorum, to make a point of order, to move to reconsider, to postpone indefinitely, and to table an amendment, as well as others referred to in the Senate text, matters all of which would be in order if not done with the dilatory intent, add up to the conclusion that if an amendment does have a dilatory intent or effect that even though otherwise restricting the effect of the bill it may be under proper circumstances declared to be dilatory by the Chair or by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule states as follows, in answer to the Senator from Louisiana, in response to his inquiry:

No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My inquiry is that the question of whether or not an amendment is dilatory can be in proper circumstances—can address matters other than whether or not it is germane or whether or not it restricts the effect of the bill. It may extend in a proper circumstance to the intent or effect of the amendment if that intent or effect is dilatory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator realizes that the standards are different as applied to whether or not an amendment is dilatory or an amendment is germane. In the latter case, of course, the standard would be applied to the amendment itself and not to the question of intent.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Well, I ask the Chair is it not a fact that there are many precedents that say that the taking of an action or the making of a motion otherwise allowable under the rules, specifically allowable—and I cited some of those examples like an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, calling for a quorum, and so forth—that those matters can in a proper circumstance be determined to be dilatory if the intent or the effect of those motions is dilatory?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's analysis is generally correct. However, the Chair must add that the right of a Senator to appeal the ruling of the Chair is a basic right of each Senator. Only in the most extraordinary circumstances will it be held to be dilatory.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand that. Postcloture, of course, in a situation of being dilatory is an extraordinary circumstance or can be and, indeed, I think that is what precedents, referred to on page 247 of Senate procedure which declared that an appeal from the ruling of the Chair was dilatory, were directed at that kind of extraordinary circumstances; is that not correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not intend to reinterpret that decision. The Senator is correct though in his recall of the circumstances of the decision that was made by the Chair at that time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My final question—and I thank my colleague for yielding—my final question is: In similar extraordinary circumstances is it not consistent with the rules and precedents that an amendment otherwise in order could be ruled to be dilatory in the extraordinary circumstance of intent and effect? I can give many examples of that kind of an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I am sorry to inform the Senator that the Chair cannot operate on hypotheticals at this point. The Chair would have to be faced with the real circumstances to give an interpretation beyond what has already been established in the rules and in the precedents of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well.

The Chair did not mean to say there were no circumstances other than those described by the Chair where an amendment could be determined to be dilatory?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is describing only circumstances that are clearly defined in the rules and precedents of the Senate, and did not intend to provide any information or any views on how the Chair might act under some hypothetical situation described by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Chair did not intend to give the exclusive circumstances under which an amendment could be declared dilatory; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be very difficult for the Chair to give exclusive circumstances under which the rules so quoted by the Chair, previously quoted by the Chair, would apply.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Chair.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, again addressing the parliamentary inquiry, the Chair has cited a 1977 precedent on the question of dilatory actions which predate the adoption of the rule XXII changes of 1979. Does not the principle of a 100-hour cap change the necessity for rulings as to the dilatory nature of motions or amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the rule was changed to provide a 100-hour cap the prohibition on dilatory amendments, amendments not germane, and dilatory motions was left intact in the rule and is, therefore, still enforceable under the present circumstances.

Mr. WEICKER. My last question, emanating from the first line of inquiry, is who or what determines dilatory intent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the precedents of the Senate quoted previously, it is the Chair who takes the initiative to determine dilatory intent and nongermane amendments, and both such determinations by the Chair are subject to appeal.

Mr. WEICKER. My second parliamentary inquiry is after cloture is invoked what is the Chair's interpretation of conditions on a Senator's right to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Once again referring the Senator to the book of Senate Procedure, and I quote:

The Vice President, when operating under post cloture in 1977, held that the Chair "possesses the authority to determine the existence of a quorum under cloture." The Chair having ruled that the suggestion of the absence of a quorum was dilatory stated in response to a question at that time that "under the rules of the Senate, under rule XXII, any motion, amendment, or other matter that is put that is dilatory can be ruled out of order. The Chair makes that judgment."

Mr. WEICKER. My third parliamentary inquiry: Has a Senator, after cloture has been invoked, the right to call up an amendment or make a motion without debate when his hour under cloture has expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are no precedents directly on point after cloture has been invoked.

However, the precedents of the Senate when dealing with the expiration of time under unanimous-consent agreement allow amendments to be called up, although without debate.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank the Chair for the response to my parliamentary inquiries.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to have printed in the RECORD a letter dated February 4, 1982, from the American Bar Association to the Honorable STROM THURMOND.

I ask unanimous consent that three editorials, one of February 8, 1982, entitled "The Court Strippers," in the New York Times; another of February 8, 1982, entitled "Running the Bus Backward," from the Washington Post; and a third dated February 8, 1982, entitled "Another Senate Half-Step," from the Hartford Courant, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C. February 4, 1982.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: The American Bar Association is deeply opposed to the proposals currently pending in the Senate Judiciary Committee that would restrict or abolish Federal court jurisdiction or deny remedies in certain constitutional cases.

At its 1981 Annual Meeting, the Association, by an overwhelming vote, adopted a resolution opposing "the legislative curtailment of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States or the inferior Federal courts for the purpose of effecting changes in constitutional law." I enclose a copy of the resolution and the accompanying report.

In adopting this resolution, the ABA took no position on the sensitive moral and social issues which are the focus of these particular legislative proposals. The subject matters of the bills are questions on which we are entitled to our own strong individual opinions. The issue is not busing or school desegregation, abortion, or prayer in the public schools; the real issue is the integrity of our system of government.

If S. 1647 or S. 1760, or any of the other pending proposals to limit the jurisdiction of the Federal courts or deny remedies should be adopted, a dangerous precedent would be established. However individuals may feel about limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts on these particular issues, there would be no stopping the process of substituting action by Congress for the process of Constitutional amendment once it is begun. A future Congress could similarly take away Federal jurisdiction or remedies on rights that the proponents of the present proposals hold most dear. In fact, if these bills succeed, jurisdiction over all constitutional rights could be taken out of the Federal courts, one at a time, or all together.

Therefore we believe strongly that, as a matter of policy, this nation should not start down a road where, each time a decision of the Supreme Court or lower Federal court offends that particular Congress, the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to hear that issue or fashion remedies would be stripped away. At a time when the Administration is calling for judicial restraint in the name of preserving the separation of powers, we urge that Congress should likewise exercise legislative restraint in invading the province of the judicial. Congress has observed that restraint in the past, and it is particularly important that it do so now.

The proposals under consideration do threaten our Constitution, the independence and supremacy in constitutional questions of the Federal trial and appellate courts, and of the Supreme Court itself. The admitted purpose of these bills is to change the constitutional law as interpreted by the branch of the Federal government to which the power of interpretation was entrusted by the Constitution. If state courts adhere to Federal precedent, the bills accomplish nothing, except further to overcrowd the state court systems. If they interpret the Constitution in new ways, they present the possibility of 50 unrelated states applying different constitutional law. The Conference of Chief Justices of our states at its meeting just concluded strongly expressed the concern of state courts over these bills. A copy of the resolution of the Conference is enclosed.

If the people strongly disagree with Federal court interpretations of the Constitution, means of change that are consistent with the separation of powers do exist. The proper method of altering the Constitution, without doing violence to the proper functioning of each branch of government, is through the amendment process provided in Article V. The ABA has long opposed efforts to alter constitutional interpretations through means other than constitutional amendment. To be sure, the amendment process is cumbersome, but deliberately so. More than the usual care should be taken before we alter our basic organic document or fractionate out strength standing together as a nation. The amendment process provides the best protection of the fundamental rights of all our citizens against the changing policy views of shifting local majorities or successive Congresses or Administrations.

Over the years, the Congress has wisely rejected calls from either the right or the left to substitute legislative solutions for basic constitutional protections. We urge the Committee to continue to resist the pressure to substitute Congress' role for that of the Federal courts and to defeat the pending proposals. To do less would be to precipitate a constitutional crisis that would divide our nation as it has not been divided in more than a century.

Sincerely,

DAVID R. BRINK.

THE COURT STRIPPERS

Some senators want to rewrite the old maxim that for every wrong there's a remedy. The current right-wing version is that for every right that the Federal courts recognize, there should be a law that strips the courts of the power to enforce it.

In one bill after another, Congressmen want to tell Federal courts to stay out of important, controversial cases. It's an easy way to tame an over-active judiciary, say voices on the right. But if they were true conservatives, they would recognize these court-stripping bills for what they really are: cheap attacks on the Constitution.

On the Senate floor now, the attack is on busing, via an appropriations rider that forbids busing even when it is the only remedy for purposeful school segregation. Later there will be a bill directing Federal courts to reopen old school cases and abandon milder desegregation remedies unless minorities can prove their cases all over again.

Then there's a bill to define abortion as murder and deny Federal courts and the Supreme Court the power to say the contrary. Another bill would forbid Federal court interference with "voluntary" public school prayer as defined by those who want to skirt Supreme Court rulings.

All these are offered as perfectly proper court-regulating measures. All are of dubious constitutionality. All are dangerous.

Is that merely partisan opinion? It's shared by distinguished lawyers of all political coloration.

The American Bar Association president, David Brink, fears the court-stripping bills will create "the most serious constitutional crisis since our great Civil War." The chief justices of all 50 states call the idea "a hazardous experiment with the nation's judicial system." Retired Justice Potter Stewart said last year that he was glad he wouldn't have to review such laws "and I hope this Court will never have to wrestle with such questions because I hope that no such legislation will be enacted."

Robert Bork, a critic of many Supreme Court decisions, has made clear his belief that court-stripping is no way to deal with unpopular rulings; his conservative credentials are such that President Reagan has named him to the United States Court of Appeals in Washington.

One of the few notable lawyers missing from this company is Attorney General William French Smith. The danger of these court-stripping bills is appreciated at every level of the Justice Department but the top one. He seems to fear the wrath of the new right more than the destruction of old rights.

The court-baiting senators are right when they say the Constitution allows Congress to change Federal court jurisdiction and regulate the Supreme Court's review powers. But that is a lot different from insisting that Congress can selectively wipe out constitutional rights by cutting citizens off from Federal courts.

It's sad that other senators, like Lowell Weicker of Connecticut, should have to filibuster to make the point: bills like the anti-busing measures are umpire-killing tricks, their anti-constitutional purpose only thinly disguised. But it's not too late for Congress to wake up and recognize what it is being asked to do. It should defend the courts, not assault them.

RUNNING THE BUS BACKWARD

In an effort to put the brakes on court-ordered school busing, the Senate voted last week to adopt a controversial and possibly unconstitutional amendment to the Justice Department authorization bill. The amendment, offered by Sens. J. Bennett Johnston of Louisiana and Jesse Helms of North Carolina, first forbids the Justice Department to bring any court action that would result in the transportation of schoolchildren beyond the neighborhood school in order to overcome segregation. It goes on to limit severely the power of federal courts to deal with school segregation. In addition to removing the right of the courts to issue most busing orders in the future, the amendment would authorize the Justice Department to go to court and reopen any busing case upon receipt of a complaint from an affected student or his parent.

You don't have to like busing to understand why this is bad legislation. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan put it succinctly: "Despite my feelings about busing and its limitations and its failure in many instances, I am, nonetheless troubled by an amendment which would remove from the federal courts the power to enforce the Constitution. It is a pernicious approach to a difficult problem and I hope that the U.S. Senate will avoid it."

Certainly, busing is a last-resort remedy to the problem of segregated schools, and has been so used by the courts since the '60s. No federal judge wants to get into the business of redrawing school boundaries and devising route maps. But where intractable situations, fears and injustices cannot be overcome except by putting children of different races into the same school, the courts must continue to have the latitude to work out remedies that fit individual situations. The Johnson-Helms amendment severely restricts their freedom to do so.

The most disruptive element of the amendment, however, is the so-called "reopener" provision. School officials in Virginia communities that have had some experience with busing expressed dismay when they learned that long-settled cases could be re-litigated if the Senate action stands. In Richmond, which has been busing since 1971, James Tyler, deputy superintendent of schools commented, "I don't know how you undo an egg that's been scrambled." In Norfolk, school Superintendent Albert Ayars said, "We feel great benefits have come from our plan . . . we really looked upon all this as being settled." He predicted that the adoption of the Johnston-Helms amendment "would resegregate many schools in Norfolk."

The best authority on the folly of reopening old school desegration cases remains Assistant Attorney General William Bradford Reynolds. He was quoted on this subject in this space on Dec. 8, and he's still right about it. "The law generally recognizes a special interest in the finality of judgments," he said, "and that interest is particularly strong in the area of school desegregation. Nothing we have learned in the 10 years since Swann leads to the conclusion that the public would be well served by reopening wounds that have long since healed."

ANOTHER SENATE HALF-STEP

Theoretically, if every step taken toward a goal is half the length of the step before, then the goal will never be reached.

So, if Connecticut Sen. Lowell P. Weicker manages to restrict the Senate to making half-steps toward the passage of social legislation that would gut the U.S. Constitution, then that august body may never arrive.

One can only hope.

Sen. Weicker, who has been leading a little band of willful liberals in a sporadic fight against anti-busing since June, joined the fray again last week while the Senate was considering a proposal that would severely limit the power of the federal courts to impose busing as a remedy to school segregation.

The measure, an amendment to the Justice Department authorization bill, succeeded by a vote of 58 to 38, but the bill as a whole has yet to pass. Mr. Weicker plans to continue his filibuster this week and to delay the bill, if necessary, with some 300 amendments he has ready to propose.

The senator has been criticized by some of his colleagues as a "headline hunter" and worse. He certainly revels in his dramatic role as the heroic obstructionist.

But whether his motive is more truly to protect the integrity of the Constitution or to seek his own aggrandizement in an election year, the fight is worthwhile.

The measure would prevent the courts from ordering busing plans that involve transporting schoolchildren more than five miles from home or more than 15 minutes. It would also allow the Justice Department to overturn any existing plans that exceed those limits.

The question is not whether busing is popular as a tool for desegration, it isn't. Nor is it whether busing is effective, the record is mixed.

The question is whether Congress should be able to impede the federal courts in the exercise of their constitutional power, which includes the authority to alleviate racial discrimination by any means they deem appropriate. It should not.

If the Senate gets away with this, then an entree would be provided for a score of other bills in the wings that would also slap restrictions on the federal courts when they deal with a whole range of issues.

Sen. Weicker has chosen a good place to make his stand.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I would like to at this time read from an antique edition of Washington's Farewell Addresss of September 19, 1796, a copy of the address having been given to me by Dick Weed of Brantford, Conn.

I think one section is particularly apropos to the debate that has been on this floor since June of last year. I now quote:

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for through this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

I yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of discussion, both on this floor and in some newspapers, on the question of the constitutionality of this measure.

Mr. President, most of that discussion—in fact, precious little of it—deals with the actual constitutional provision involved, that is principally section 5 of the 14th amendment. No one bothers to talk about the history of that amendment; indeed, no one bothers to even quote the provisions of it; and certainly no one bothers to quote the most recent Supreme Court cases which interpret section 5 of the 14th amendment which provides a role for Congress. Indeed, the American Bar Association did not do so, the New York Times did not do so, and the Washington Post did not do so.

I think in order to have a really elevating and illuminating discussion on this measure we ought to zero in on what is involved. What is involved here is the 14th amendment and section 5 thereof and, to a lesser extent, article III of the Constitution. What is involved is also the question of busing and whether it works. And we have had no discussion on those two measures. I wish we did. If we did, we would really join the issue.

But let me say one thing about this question of separation of powers and whether we are arrogating the proper function of the court. Mr. President, if this measure passes, and passes both Houses of the Congress, it will undoubtedly be brought before the courts for a test. Now it is important for everyone to realize what is perfectly obvious, and that is that the question of whether this measure is constitutional or not will be decided by that same Supreme Court. And if, as I do not expect, if, as some would argue, it is unconstitutional, then we have not taken away the power of the Court so to declare it.

That matter was decided earlier in the history of this country in a case called Marbury against Madison. That is to say that the Supreme Court, while they may be not omniscient, they may certainly be omnipotent when it comes to interpreting the Constitution. We do not propose or purport to be taking away that power.

So, Mr. President, what we are doing as a Congress—and I hope that the whole Congress will join—is to exercise the powers given by the 14th amendment to this Congress. The very Supreme Court that is going to make this interpretation has on two occasions said it is for the Congress to determine, first of all, whether there is a need for a remedy and, second, the scope of that remedy. That inquiry is the same kind of inquiry that is made in determining whether the necessary and proper clause is satisfied. And the necessary and proper clause inquiry, in turn, is satisfied, so says the Supreme Court, when they can determine that there was a rational basis for congressional action.

Now, if the Supreme Court is true to their decisions and if the 14th amendment, or section 5 thereof and article III of the Constitution mean what they seem to mean and mean what the precedents appear to mean, then this bill is clearly constitutional. More than that, Mr. President, it is clearly needed.

As David J. Armor says—and I have quoted him before but it is important to repeat:

There is overwhelming social science evidence that mandatory busing has failed as a feasible remedy for school segregation.

So, Mr. President, if there is overwhelming evidence that it has failed—and that evidence comes in from my State on a daily basis, as well as other places around the country—it is time the Congress exercised the power that it has under the Constitution.

One final word, Mr. President. I was quoted here on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere that in saying in Baton Rouge, La., 6-year-old children were bused 1½ hours in one direction for a total of 3 hours. The Federal judge in Baton Rouge wrote a letter to the school board and said, in effect, that "If this is so, it is not consistent with the intent of my order."

This morning, I called Dr. Ray Arverson, who is the superintendent of schools in East Baton Rouge Parish, who was the source of my original information. Dr. Arverson confirmed the correctness of that information. He further said that they were getting together the particular facts. And he further said that the distances would be even longer but for the fact that so many children have withdrawn from schools that the busing lengths are less. He talked about one bus, for example, that was assigned 60 children and only 30 showed up. The other 30 simply were not going to take the 1½ hour bus ride. He further told me that over 4,000 children had dropped out at the elementary level alone. That is East Baton Rouge Parish.

About 3 weeks ago in Caddo Parish, my home parish—that is a county in ever other State—that is I guess the second or third largest city, Baton Rouge is the second largest, Shreveport is the third largest—they just had the tax election for the schools. Shreveport has a long history of strong support for public education. This one they beat. A new set of orders coming out on busing and they beat the tax election. That is a trend that has gone across this country, as children withdraw from public schools, as taxpayers vote down bond issues, withdraw their support and set up separate schools.

Indeed, there is another article in the Baton Rouge paper where some of those who disagreed with my position also were jumping on the Catholic Church there, saying that they were opening up a new school for segregation intent. Well, I think if there is one group of people, one religion that has shown its absolute support for human rights, for equal protection, for due process of law, it is the Catholic Church. But the point is, Mr. President, the children need an education and they are withdrawing from public schools.

Now, Mr. President, it is time that we in the Congress went back to the basics and supported public education by voting for this cloture motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired. The remaining time is under the control of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Connecticut for yielding.

The hour is near when we have to vote, Mr. President. Let me just summarize the statement I intended to make by saying that I think no one in this Chamber, and I am one, likes busing. Nobody likes busing. None of us like to send our children to school by bus. It causes problems.

On the other hand, all of us recognize that we have a constitutional form of government. The reason for the Constitution is to protect individual liberties, individual citizens' individual rights. Also under our form of government, the Supreme Court, with the independence of the Federal judiciary, is the institution which basically decides what the Constitution says.

Frankly, I think the reason we are here is because we in the Congress have not taken up our responsibility by fashioning remedies that Federal courts can use or not use in trying to settle discrimination cases. We have left it to the courts. We, therefore, blame the courts when they do something which we do not like.

Fundamentally, I think it comes down to a conflict between individual rights and civil rights, on the one hand, and congressional failure on the other. I think it strongly behooves us to follow the Constitution; that the Constitution says that individual liberties and civil liberties should be protected, and then for us in the Congress to fashion a hierachy of remedies or to do what we can to help address this problem.

In the final analysis, it is a constitutional right if it can be vindicated and it can only be vindicated if there is an effective remedy. And then if we in the Congress cannot remedy it and if the Court does fashion the remedy, then that remedy is a proper vindication of the constitutional right as it is stated in the constitution and so found in the Constitution by the Supreme Court of the United States.

This is a very, very dangerous action we are taking here today. It is a very close first cousin to efforts to limit Supreme Court jurisdiction of Federal constitutional issues.

Once we start sliding down that slippery slope, limiting Supreme Court jurisdiction to constitutional questions, I tell you that we will be undermining, fundamentally, our form of government and will be making a gross mistake.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

(The following proceedings occurred during the call of the roll:)

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARNER). The Chair has received a request that order be restored in the Chamber, and until such time as that occurs, the clerk will suspend the call of the roll.

The Chair respectfully requests Senators to return to their seats and clear the well, so that the clerk may continue the tally.

The assistant legislative clerk continued the call of the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Regular order. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

Mr. D'AMATO. Aye.

Mr. CANNON. Aye.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. KASTEN. Aye.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will prepare the tally.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, am I recorded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, how is the junior Senator from Nebraska recorded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. PELL. On this vote I have a live pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "aye." I therefore withhold my vote.

(This announcement was subsequently negated by both Senator KENNEDY and Senator PELL voting.)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will now tally the vote.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk is in the process of tallying the vote.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Regular order, Mr. President. The Presiding Officer has the vote. Announce the vote.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has sought recognition.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Under the rules, the Chair must announce the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is still receiving responses to its request.

Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

Mr. DOLE. Aye.

Mr. STEVENS. Aye.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will present the tally.

Mr. WEICKER. Aye.

Mr. KENNEDY. No.

Mr. PELL. Aye.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will present the tally.

Mr. WEICKER. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

There being no other Senators who desire to vote on this vote, the yeas are 62, the nays are 33. Three-fifths of the Senators——

Mr. SIMPSON. Aye.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair repeats: On this vote the yeas are 63, the nays are 33. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn having voted in the affirmative, the motion is agreed to.

(Conclusion of proceedings during call of the roll.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I indicated earlier if cloture is invoked, under the provisions of rule XXII, of course, it will be necessary for the Senate to continue consideration of this measure until it is completed.

There are four exceptions to that which have been agreed to by unanimous consent. First, that any time on or after the 22d of February on motion of the majority leader after consulting with the minority leader, it would be possible, notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII, to proceed to the consideration of the resolution dealing with the recommendations of the Select Committee on Ethics in respect to Senator HARRISON WILLIAMS.

The others are three urgent supplemental appropriations bills, one of which is at the desk at this time I am told; the other two should be received from the other body before very long.

Mr. President, the rule also provides that control of time now will be designated by the majority and minority leaders, and while the minority leader is not on the floor at this moment he and I have discussed this matter. While it is the reversal of roles to do so, I believe in this case it would be more appropriate for the minority leader to designate the Senator in control of the time for the proponents and I will designate the Senator from Connecticut to be in control of the time of the opponents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYAKAWA). The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the majority leader while he is on the floor.

Mr. President, I have great respect for this body and for the rules that we operate under, and I also have tremendous respect for the majority leader and the Presiding Officer whomsoever that may be at any particular point. But I must confess, Mr. President, and Mr. Majority Leader, that I think the procedure that was just followed when the Presiding Officer had in his hand the vote and refused to announce it and delayed it deliberately in order that others might vote is contrary to the procedures we followed in this body in the past. I am well aware of the fact that when the Senators are on their feet demanding recognition the normal procedure is to give them an opportunity to speak in order to change their vote or to ask for their vote to be clarified, but that was not the situation in this instance and the Presiding Officer actually held onto the vote and refused to announce it.

I might also point out that subsequent in time to that the Presiding Officer then announced the vote and with no further ado a Member of the Senate was permitted to vote after that time.

My understanding is that in the past that has only been permitted with unanimous consent and this Senator would not have objected to granting that unanimous consent, but once the vote is announced we have not permitted anyone to add his vote without unanimous consent in the past.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have only the highest regard for the Senator from Ohio, but I must say in all fairness that I think he is wrong on both points that he has just made.

To begin with, it is the unbroken precedent of the Senate, I believe, that when Senators have not yet voted and are in the Chamber and wish to vote the regular order is for those Senators to be given that opportunity.

There were two Senators here who had not voted. It was clear that they were still engaged in the question of deciding which way to vote. The Chair twice put the question, Are there other Senators wishing to vote?—and on the second occasion, would they please signify their intention to vote.

Keep in mind that it requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to excuse a Senator from voting. So there was a heavy responsibility on these two Senators to vote when they were present.

Therefore, I think in that case, without any doubt in my mind at least, the precedent of the Senate dictated and the Chair conducted that situation properly in inquiring of the Senators who had not voted but were in the Chamber if they wished to vote and retaining the tally uncomplete until they responded, which they did by casting their votes.

I might say parenthetically that another Senator was on his way and had sent word that he would shortly arrive in the Chamber. That would not be, in my judgment, sufficient basis for extending the time for a rollcall vote, a simple message that a Senator was on the way.

But in this case, in addressing the second point made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, the Chair had not pronounced the full effect of rule XXII, that is to say three-fifths of the Senate having voted in the affirmative under the provisions of rule XXII debate shall be brought to a close in keeping with the language of that rule, the Standing Rules of the Senate.

Before that full pronouncement was made, which is the judgment of the Chair, before that was done another Senator arrived in the Chamber and sought recognition. It is my opinion that the Chair properly recognized him so that he could be included on this rollcall and that that procedure fuly conformed with the precedent of the Senate as it has been universally applied in the past.

Mr. STEVENS. It did not change the outcome either.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I might say to the majority leader I am not going to belabor the point, but I do think that it is important that this body follow the rules and that we adjudicate the issues on the basis of those rules regardless of what our personal views may be. I am not going to belabor the point, but I did feel that they were somewhat abused in the last instance.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do appreciate that and I do not think the Senator from Ohio is doing it, but I really do not accept at face value the idea that I was abusing the rules.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I did not say that the majority leader was abusing the rules.

Mr. BAKER. I put this parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, is it not the precedent of the Senate that when Senators are present in the Chamber and have not yet voted the regular order is to permit them to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Is there any exception to that precedent of which the Chair is aware?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware of any such exception.

Mr. BAKER. The second parliamentary inquiry: Is it not the precedent of the Senate that before the Chair pronounces its final judgment in this case on the application of rule XXII it is the regular order for a Senator seeking recognition to be given recognition in order to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Chair respond to another parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is it not the fact that the rules of the Senate provide that there are 15 minutes permitted for a rollcall vote and that immediately thereafter it is the responsibility of the tally clerk to advise the President of the Senate what the vote is and that he has an obligation then to promptly indicate to the Members of the body what the vote is regardless of whether or not there were Members in the Senate who have not voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules do not provide such time on a vote.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am sorry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has limited rollcall votes to 15 minutes by unanimous consent.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Do I understand the Presiding Officer to say that a rollcall vote is not to be concluded within 15 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is customary to go beyond 15 minutes if a Senator is seeking to vote.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I understand that, but that is not my question. My question is, Is the customary period provided by the rules 15 minutes and then the voting is concluded unless someone is in the Chamber seeking recognition that he may vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing in the rules limiting one to 15 minutes if there are Senators still wishing to vote.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BAKER. Is it not true that under the precedents of the Senate rollcall votes have been set by unanimous consent——

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, could we have order? The majority leader is making an important parliamentary point.

Mr. BAKER. And that indeed the 15-minute span for rollcall vote is set not by the rules but set by unanimous consent; is that not correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Is it not also correct that the precedent of the Senate is that notwithstanding that 15-minute period may have expired if Senators who have not voted are in the Chamber and wish to vote the regular order is to permit them to vote even though the time required to do so will extend beyond 15 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

If a Senator is present who did not vote, he may do so prior to the announcement of the decision; in fact, if a Senator were seeking recognition to vote prior to the announcement by the Chair, he is entitled to cast his vote.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I think we have pretty well established the parameters of that procedure. I think it is a fundamental procedure that has not been varied from in my experience in the Senate, and I have nothing further to add to that.

I believe under the circumstances the matter is disposed of at this point.

Mr. President, may I inquire against whose time have these inquiries been charged?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Against the time for the Senators involved.

Mr. BAKER. Very well. Then the time for the 1 hour provided under rule XXII postcloture for the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Tennessee will be charged against our respective time according to the length of our presentation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, I wish to announce that I yield my hour of time to Senator WEICKER even though I am not supporting his position.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I would like to yield my time of 1 hour to Senator WEICKER from Connecticut even though I share an opposite view.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

The first committee amendment is as follows:

On page 2, line 14, strike "Administration: $37,653,000." and insert the following: "Administration;

"(C) financial assistance to joint State and joint State and local law enforcement agencies engaged in cooperative enforcement efforts with respect to drug related offenses, organized criminal activity and all related support activities, not to exceed $12,576,000, and to remain available until expended: $50,229,000."

Mr. METZENBAUM. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has asked for the yeas and nays. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I move to table, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, could I have recognition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am unsure as to what we are trying to address at the moment. As I understand it, the Senator from Connecticut asked for the yeas and nays on the first committee amendment, is that correct?

Mr. WEICKER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Was that granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was not a sufficient second.

Mr. BAKER. Does the Senator from Connecticut wish to ask for that again?

Mr. WEICKER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is.

Mr. BAKER. Now, do I understand that the Senator from North Carolina had sought to table the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HELMS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to lay on the table the first committee amendment.

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Can we have order in the Chamber?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I, for once, insist on my point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has been heard. Will Senators please clear the well and carry their conversations elsewhere.

The clerk will proceed with the rollcall.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, point of order. The Senate is not in order, and on this matter I said earlier I will insist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has been heard.

The Senator from West Virginia is quite right in insisting that there be order in the Chamber. Senators will please empty the well and carry their conversations elsewhere, outside the room, in the cloakrooms, carry their discussions elsewhere. May we have a silence worthy of this dignified body?

Is the Senator from West Virginia satisfied with the degree of order we now have?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, there is only a degree of order. I shall not however, continue my efforts at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I thank the Senator from West Virginia.

The clerk will please proceed with the rollcall.

The assistant legislative clerk resumed and completed the call of the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) and the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN) is absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 36, as follows:

URGENT COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in accordance with the unanimous-consent order entered earlier today, I am authorized, after consulting with the minority leader, to ask the Senate to lay aside temporarily the pending measure and proceed to one of the so-called urgent supplemental bills.

I have now consulted with the minority leader and pursuant to that authority I ask that the Senate now proceed to the consideration, under the terms and conditions described, of House Joint Resolution 389, the Commodity Credit Corporation supplemental appropriations, which is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution. The legislative clerk read as follows:

A House joint resolution (H.J. Res. 389) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982, for the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be considered as having been read the second time by title.

Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, before we have the ball thrown up in the air, may I say, for the benefit of all Senators that we shall not return to consideration of the Department of Justice authorizations bill this evening. We shall return to it at some time after this session day when the circumstances seem propitious.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator be so generous as to yield for a 3-minute opening statement by me as the manager of the bill?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Of course. I ask the distinguished chairman to forgive me.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York. I know he is about to offer an amendment, but if I could just have the attention of the Senate and have order in the Senate, I wish to make a few comments about this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture, for a number of months, has been telling the members of the Committee on Appropriations that he is going to run into difficulty very soon on maintaining the viability of many of our farm commodities and that he has to have this legislation. I am indicating that the urgency of this resolution cannot be exaggerated. I think anyone who has made any study of the proposition faced by the Secretary of Agriculture and this country's Government realizes the truth of his statement. I quote from a letter of February 5 this year:

> We appreciate the expeditious action of the Congress and especially of the House Appropriations Committee in dealing with this matter. It is truly an urgent situation. Unanticipated high levels of losses have endangered the continued operation of our farm programs at a time when farmers are particularly vulnerable and especially in need of these programs. We need final approval of this proposal by Tuesday, February 9, 1982.

That is this date, Mr. President. Therefore, I am asking that the Senate adopt this proposal, this supplemental, without amendment because amending it would create the necessity of carrying over for a conference committee meeting with the House. The delays of that would then, of course, cause difficulty in meeting the February 9 deadline.

Let there be no mistake, Mr. President. Our farmers are facing financial ruin in a disruption in the ability of the Department of Agriculture to provide modest price support assistance. This may be the last straw that casts many of our farmers into bankruptcy.

I cannot emphasize the seriousness of this situation too strongly, so we have asked that this measure be held at the desk, as it has been. Senator COCHRAN of Mississippi is the chairman of the Appropriations Committee which handles this and will be managing the bill. I, as chairman of the full committee, and my ranking minority leader, Senator PROXMIRE of Wisconsin, felt the urgency of this is sufficient that I should make an opening statement as the chairman of the full committee before I turn the floor over for the management of the measure to the subcommittee chairman.

Mr. President, I should like to yield briefly, if the Senator from New York will be so gracious, to let the comanager of the bill, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), make a few remarks in opening.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I realize the Senator from New York has the floor and yielded very briefly.

First, I support everything the distinguished manager of the bill has said. We have only $787 million left as of January 22 of this year, just a couple of weeks ago, in the Commodity Credit Corporation. That is now down to about $372 million as of yesterday.

There have been huge drawdowns, primarily attributable to depressed market conditions resulting from record 1981 crops, with over half the loans placed in wheat and feed grain reserve. The usual 9-month loans have been augmented with grain reserve loans having maturities of up to 5 years and storage facility loans of up to 10 years. What that means is that that money does not come back into the CCC's revolving fund as quickly.

Interest rates paid by the CCC into the Treasury have increased from 4.125 percent in fiscal year 1978 to 15 percent in fiscal year 1981. Of course, that has contributed to the sharp increase in CCC costs.

Any Senator with any agriculture in their State knows what desperate condition our farmers are in, particularly our grain farmers, who will be heavily hit by the inability of the CCC to provide the funds that are due to them.

For all of these reasons, Mr. President, the CCC is expected to run out of funds within the next few days—I mean sometime in the middle of next week—unless we pass this resolution.

That is why the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee is 100 percent right in asking us to act promptly and not encumber the resolution with amendments, because that would undoubtedly delay it, necessitate a conference, and make it impossible for us to act in time. I understand the House is to go out tomorrow night. A conference, therefore, would doom the resolution and mean it would have to go over until February 22. By that time, farmers would be in really desperate shape. I think nobody wants to force that kind of unfortunate situation on our farmers.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Will the Senator from New York permit me to yield briefly to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Of course.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Wisconsin.

I just wish to state briefly how critically important it is that we move rapidly on the measure that has been introduced, that basically adds $5 billion to the loan authority for the Commodity Credit Corporation.

The Commodity Credit Corporation is, right now, or is about to run out of money essentially because of the heavy demand by the farmers of our great country, the food producers, who are in the most dire straits that they have been in since the Great Depression of 1933.

In essence, Mr. President, this is an entitlement, because everything that is being borrowed is a result of the 1981 Agricultural Act.

As the Chair knows, this Senator felt that this particular act did not supply funds either in loan or target prices that were nearly sufficient and because of the dire straits that the farmers are in today, with the commodity markets continuing to plunge, as they did once again today, I simply state that the farm economy cannot stand any more shocks. It is, therefore, necessary that we expedite the passage of this resolution.

I say, Mr. President, that I had offered a separate measure to provide for this $5 billion increase, but it is deemed that the most expeditious way to handle this is with the resolution that rapidly passed the House of Representatives. I urge the Senate to follow suit rapidly.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Commodity Credit Corporation is designed to serve farmers and the public every working day in every region of the country. In order for its functions to continue as provided by law, it is imperative that Congress approve this supplemental appropriation for the CCC.

The Congress has mandated the CCC to maintain a variety of programs, including farm price support programs, farm storage facility loans, export financing, and several other functions. As a financing arm of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the CCC has been granted borrowing authority to implement these programs, some of which operate as entitlements.

As American agriculture has grown and advanced over the years, so has the CCC expanded and changed. The CCC was originally incorporated in 1933. Congress has increased the CCC borrowing authority 11 times since 1938.

In 1978, the Congress adopted the current level of $25 billion, effective to the extent provided in appropriations acts. The fiscal year 1979 Agriculture Appropriation Act limited the CCC to $20 billion.

At the end of any given year, CCC loans outstanding and other payments by CCC may exceed repayments of CCC loans. The net difference is identified as the "net realized loss," which is appropriated by Congress to replenish the CCC's capital. Historically this action has been taken every year as part of the annual Agricultural Appropriation Act.

The pending legislation will make the reimbursement to CCC for net realized losses now, rather than wait for the Appropriations Act. This action is necessary this time, because of the high demand for CCC loans.

Farm commodity loans, for example, are made by CCC with the farm products as collateral, thereby providing farmers both a needed cash flow and a helpful marketing alternative for crops that are raised. Farmers can thus decide to market at times other than immediately following harvest. When greater quantities of crops are produced, more demand is placed on CCC to make crop loans.

In 1981, farmers produced record-setting wheat and corn crops. Consequently, CCC loan activity has been very high. Also, funds have been or will be used for deficiency payments to producers of 1981 crops of wheat, barley, cotton, and rice.

Congress has directed that these activities occur on an entitlement basis. CCC net losses must be reimbursed to cover this demand if these programs are to continue.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to do that.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, the joint resolution before us is an urgent supplemental appropriation for fiscal year 1981 for the Department of Agriculture to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for net realized losses sustained in the past, but not previously reimbursed.

This emergency supplemental passed the House earlier today, 320 to 86. They have sent us a clean bill with no amendments, in an effort to allow us to expedite this urgent matter. On this side, the Appropriations Committee asked that the resolution be held at the desk, as we fully realize and support the urgent nature of this appropriation.

The President has requested an increase of $5 billion in the borrowing authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC).

I am advised by the Department of Agriculture that the Corporation's capital funds are dangerously low and will soon be exhausted if the Congress does not act expeditiously. At the close of business yesterday, $372 million remained available. At the current rate of operations, CCC has 5 to 6 days left before closing.

The tremendous drawdown in the Corporation's borrowing authority is primarily due to the depressed market conditions we are now experiencing as a result of record crop production in 1981, as well as the general state of our economy.

The need for this supplemental is, indeed, urgent. The programs operated through CCC are vital both to agriculture and to the American public. The commodity price support programs, as well as direct and guaranteed export financing of agricultural commodities, are funded through the CCC borrowing authority.

Under current law, the Corporation may have outstanding loans of $25 billion to finance operations, but only to the extent funds have been appropriated. The appropriation limitation is currently set at $20 billion. The emergency appropriation before us today would reimburse the Corporation for expenditures made during fiscal years 1980, 1981, and the first quarter of 1982, thus restoring $5 billion of borrowing authority within the limits already prescribed by law.

With the $5 billion in this urgent request, CCC could meet its obligations to make cotton and rice deficiency and other commodity payments due this month, and already-postponed interest payments to the Treasury due in September. For example, thousands of cotton and rice farmers are expecting payments this month totaling over a billion dollars.

Without these emergency funds, CCC will be forced to cease operations, which would certainly upset the orderly marketing of U.S. commodities. This disastrous impact of a CCC shutdown would be to create panic in the farm sector and a loss of faith and confidence in the price support system.

Mr. President, the urgency for the supplemental is very real. I strongly urge my colleagues to adopt this measure without amendment.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 819

(Subsequently numbered amendment No. 1268.)

(Purpose: To declare Poland to be in default of its debts.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment on behalf of myself and Mr. KASTEN and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), for himself and Mr. KASTEN, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 819.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I ask unanimous consent that further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, after the numeral "5,000,000,000", insert the following: ": Provided that none of the funds appropriated by this resolution may be available during any Fiscal Year in which (a) the Commodity Credit Corporation makes payments under loan guarantee or credit assurance agreements with respect to loans made or credits extended to Poland in the absence of a declaration of default, and (b) the President has not provided a monthly written report to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate explaining the manner in which the national security interest of the United States has been served by any payments during the previous month under loan guarantee or credit assurance agreements with respect to loans made or credits extended to Poland in the absence of a declaration of default.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced S. 2079, legislation that would require Poland to be declared in default of its debt to American lenders before the United States honors its loan guarantees to the lenders. I now offer an amendment to the bill before the Senate, the suppplemental appropriation bill for the Commodity Credit Corporation, that would have the same effect.

The legislation I introduced yesterday would require that Poland be declared in default before any payments could be made by U.S. Government agencies—such as the Commodity Credit Corporation or the Export-Import Bank—to American individuals or corporations in satisfaction of debts incurred by Poland and guaranteed by these Government agencies.

The banks would receive the money due them according to their contractual agreements with the CCC or the Export-Import Bank. But the lenders would first have to declare that Poland is in default.

This requirement that default be declared before loan guarantees could be exercised is not a new notion; the CCC's own regulations and its loan guarantee agreements with banks required such a declaration until January 29, when the administration quietly changed the rules—as the Wall Street Journal notes this morning, in possible violation of the law.

The need for default is compelling; the argument, I believe, is self-evident.

Two months have passed since the imposition of martial law in Poland and the brutal suppression of Solidarity. Yet the United States and its allies have not found a way to apply meaningful pressure on either the military junta in Warsaw or its masters in Moscow to mitigate or end this repression.

Arrests and imprisonment of Solidarity members continue. Lech Walesa remains in confinement and, according to the most senior official of the Catholic Church in Poland, Archbishop Jozef Glemp, the people of Poland are "overcome by anger * * * enraged" at the suppression of their liberties.

What have we in the West done about the violent disruption of a peaceful, popularly supported process of democratization in Poland?

The United States has suspended landing rights in this country for the Polish national airline and produced a television spectacular that received mixed reviews. Our response has been near to shameful.

The President and the Secretary of State, and other leaders of the Western alliance, have said they will impose harsher sanctions if the situation in Poland does not improve.

Two months have gone by; the situation has not improved. It is time to take the next step. I believe default should be the next step.

A declaration of default would add to the financial and economic pressure on the Polish junta and on the Soviets who helped to install it. It would render impossible any commerce by Poland with the West, and make more difficult any trade by the Soviet Union. This pressure would be of the most effective kind, for any effort to resuscitate the moribund Polish economy must require loans and credits from the West.

Poland needs manufactured goods that simply cannot be produced in sufficient quantity in Eastern Europe. Poland cannot now afford to purchase these goods without assistance from the West.

While the United States should provide that assistance for as long as the Government in Poland is responding to the humanitarian and political needs of its people, I do not believe the United States should provide such assistance in the present circumstances.

The United States will only be seen by the Polish people themselves as abetting their military overlords.

Moverover, according to the policy put into place by the administration on January 29, which would permit the CCC to pay banks for guaranteed loans which Poland has failed to repay without first declaring Poland in default, the United States will spend as much as $380 million in American taxpayers' money this year in doing so.

Spending money to put pressure on the Soviet tyranny in Poland would be preferable to spending hundreds of millions of dollars to cushion Poland and the Soviet Union from the natural consequences of disastrous economic policies rooted in the suppression of the Polish people.

One important point has been obscured, no doubt unintentionally, by comments of various administration spokesmen who have indicated that a declaration of default would somehow absolve Poland of all future responsibility for its debt to the West.

That is not true. Default is not the international equivalent of bankruptcy for an individual or corporation, wherein an overextended borrower can be relieved of the obligation to pay some or all of its debts through the filing of bankruptcy papers.

Default is simply a declaration by a lender that a borrower had not fulfilled one or more of the conditions agreed to when money was borrowed. The most obvious breach of this sort would be a failure to make the loan repayments on time. This is what has happened to Poland.

A declaration of default would entitle creditors to "accelerate" the loan and demand that the entire loan be paid immediately because of cross-default provisions in most loan contracts, virtually all Poland's debts would come due immediately and creditors would be entitled to seize what real assets might be available in partial satisfaction.

Poland would still be responsible for the remainder of its debt, and would have to pay it before it would ever again be able to borrow or obtain trade credits from the United States. It would also mean that the U.S. Government, through various of its agencies, would buy the Polish debt, thus concentrating it in the hands of the Government.

This is where it belongs. Trade with Eastern Europe is strategically significant, certainly at least as much as it is commercially important.

The centerpiece of détente during the 1970's, after all, was the expansion of this trade with the Communist countries of Eastern Europe and it was encouraged by the United States with a purpose in mind. It was thought that this trade would raise the costs to the Soviet bloc of politically destabilizing actions.

We would make them dependent on trade with the West. They would be reluctant to disrupt it, and so would behave in ways more acceptable to the democracies. They would not invade other countries; they would not be so bold in the brutalizing of their own people.

What has happened? Afghanistan teaches us one lesson. The suppression of Solidarity 7 weeks ago teaches us another.

The theory of détente presupposed a Western willingness to use the economic strength that this trade provided us. If we are ever to exercise our leverage with respect to the Soviets, our strongest form of leverage, which is the economic, then the moment is at hand.

Mr. President, I am aware of the urgency of the resolution before us, as is my learned friend, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN), who held hearings on this matter just this morning in the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, of which he is chairman.

I will be brief in my exposition, but I will bring to the particular subject of my amendment an equivalent sense of urgency.

I say to the distinguished Presiding Officer that if the interests of the American farmers are at stake in this matter of financing the Commodity Credit Corporation, so is the honor of the United States involved in the terms on which we do this. Nothing less is at stake in the aftermath of the decision made in the White House which determined that American loans to the Government of Poland which had been guaranteed by the U.S. Government and on which repayment was not being paid could in fact be paid by the Commodity Credit Corporation without the theretofore routine and established requirement that the lender declare the loan to be in default.

This decision was made in the darkness of the night, without prior discussion with Congress and without public notice at the time. It was done in the darkness of night. This is not an image I would ordinarily ever want to see used about my Government, nor is it one which the distinguished columnist of the New York Times, Mr. William Safire, would lightly use. Nevertheless, Mr. Safire on February 5 wrote of the national security adviser's order "to secretly circumvent regulations requiring that Poland be placed in default."

Only through the happy circumstance that these papers came to the attention of Mr. Safire did the Nation learn this.

Mr. President, there is a very simple matter to be dealt with here. The statement of default is not a large nor a complicated proposition. It is simply a declaration by a lender that a borrower has not fulfilled one or more of the conditions agreed to when money was borrowed. This is obviously the fact when a lender comes to the CCC and asks the Government to pay him money from the public treasury because there has been a failure to repay by another party, which failure had been guaranteed against. In this case, the party which has failed to repay its loans is the Government of Poland.

I should like to draw to the attention of the Senate that loans by a government appertain to the state involved and are permanent obligations. They do not endure only for so long as a particular military dictator survives in whatever nation we might be dealing with. Nor, for that matter, do debts disappear with the normal change of governments in democratic societies.

Mr. President, why is this matter of Poland's unpaid debts important? It is important because the President of the United States quite properly expressed the great outrage of the American people and of democratic peoples everywhere at the imposition of martial law in Poland, an enterprise planned, prepared, and ordered by the Soviet Union in the most brutal disregard and abrogation of the Helsinki accords.

The President said we will not let this go by without any response. He called for a number of measures. They were limited. Polish planes could not land in the United States. A Polish commercial office in New York was made to close. The President said this would not be the last of the measures.

I should like to note that, several days ago, the U.S.S.R., in a commentary on Soviet radio, described the sanctions so far imposed by the administration as "the fleabite that the administration is trying to present as punishing the Soviet Union for developments in Poland."

What the United States is dealing with, indeed inviting, is the contempt of an armed totalitarian power. That is the most dangerous thing that could happen in our time, for to invite the contempt of the Soviet Union is to invite calamity.

We have all said we would do something about the destruction of Solidarity, or rather the suppression, as I should like it to be thought. We put on a television show, perhaps a good one, certainly a well-intended one, which nevertheless received mixed reviews. But while the Secretary of State was in Chicago, over the last weekend in January, speaking of our resolve not to let this matter pass, the opposite decision was being made back in Washington in the White House.

Mr. President, I wish to draw to the attention of the Senate the essence of our problem here. Our problem is the question of whether our actions confirm Soviet-Marxist-Leninist beliefs about how we will behave.

Nothing could be more important than for us to keep in mind that the Soviets hold together their tenuous sense that the future may yet be theirs by just a few prophecies about our behavior. Prophecies that we continue to confirm.

Without meaning anything more than to describe events, not in any way to impugn motives, I relate the following: At the economic summit in Ottawa in July, the U.S. Government sought to have its allies in Western Europe not enter into an agreement for the Yamal natural gas pipeline. Yet 12 days later the same administration issued export licenses for pipelaying equipment to a firm in Peoria that is in economic trouble, as which firm is not.

Mr. President, Lenin proposed this behavior as a fundamental characteristic of the last stage of capitalism, which he described in his book as imperialism.

I do not want to weary this Chamber with a tedious account of Marxist doctrine. I will make but a single point. Marx's book was not entitled "Socialism" or "Happiness" or "Welfare" or "Peace." The book was called "Das Kapital," "Capital." In it he described as an economic necessity the declining rate of return to capital as industrialization develops and the necessary exploitation of workers in order to keep the rate of return up, the inevitable failure of that effort, and the inevitable crash in consequence.

A half century passed from the time "Das Kapital" was published, in 1859, and the system had not crashed.

Then Lenin came forward with a fundamental revision of Marxist analysis. He said imperialism had made it possible for the capitalist nations to export surpluses and maintain the rate of return for yet another period. Another period of history would pass before the still-inevitable decline would take place. There is a statement made by Lenin, about 1923, on this subject. I will read it to Senators because it is important and ought to be understood.

He wrote:

> The capitalists of the whole world and their governments in their rush to conquer the Soviet market will close their eyes to the activity of various diplomatic subterfuges which we will involve ourselves with in the subversion of Western nations, and will thereby be turned into blind deaf mutes.

It was his view that the capitalist West would see the Soviets as its last outlet of empire, its last market.

I quote again. Mr. President, I ask Senators to pay heed. This is Lenin speaking.

They will furnish credits which will serve us for the support of the Communist Party in their countries and by supplying us materials and technical equipment which we lack will restore our military industry necessary for our future attacks against our suppliers. To put it in other words they will work on the preparation of their own suicide.

Mr. President, this is prophecy. "They will supply us credits." This is sacred text. And we confirm it. We make the most extraordinary terrifying sounds in opposition to Soviet policy, but in the dark of night we pass the credits, ship the grain, sell the pipelaying equipment. We provide this and we provide that.

If we were to do this openly and without hypocrisy, at least we would not earn their contempt. They would say of us, "They are acting as they say they will. They are doing what they must do."

But to do it secretly, to do it surreptitiously, to break our own rules, to treat the military government of Poland in a manner less harsh than that in which we would treat a grain miller in Milwaukee is to invite contempt. Again I say that it is only at great risk do we invite the contempt of an armed totalitarian superpower. That is what happened in Europe in the 1930's.

Mr. President, I do not wish to extend my remarks. I know the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to speak.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD Mr. William Safire's essay, two editorials from the Wall Street Journal, an important speech by Mr. Lane Kirkland of the AFL-CIO, a transcript of the Soviet broadcast describing our sanctions to date as "a fleabite"; and a column by Mr. George F. Will of the Washington Post.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 5, 1982]

DEFAULT IS REAGAN'S

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—With all due solemnity, the White House press office has declared that the memo quoted in this space a few days ago—revealing national security adviser Clark's order to secretly circumvent regulations requiring that Poland be placed in default—was a leak of classified information, subject to the latest lie-detector rules.

This is an illustration of the arrogance of ignorance, Mr. Clark evidently thinks that his power to stamp "secret" on documents affecting national security extends to documents that are merely politically sensitive. By confusing what is genuinely secret with what is politically embarrassing, be abuses his power to classify.

For example, his order to protect Poland from normal default procedures was passed along to at least seven major American banks at noon Friday of last week. The Polish junta was promptly informed; the West German banks were notified; the Kremlin knew all about it. The only people not in on Mr. Clark's "secret" was the American people, whose tax money was being used to make good Poland's debt.

Moreover, Mr. Clark's improper use of his classification power could have made it possible for bank insiders to benefit from information denied to the investing public. The $71 million payment was good news for worried bankers; perhaps bank stock activity was wholly unrelated to this development, but the Clark abuse of secrecy made a mockery of S.E.C. "full disclosure" requirements.

The abuse of the classification power was compounded by the coverup that followed. A party line was propounded at State that turned truth on its head: the cave-in to the junta's financial needs was described in testimony to Senate Percycats as a triumph of toughness. Default, went this Orwellian agrument, would let the debtor "off the hook"; only by preventing default, insisted the Secretary of State, could we recover our money.

In the case of sovereign nations, that alibi is palpably false. Countries are not corporations with limited liability; when Poland defaults, it must make good on its debts before getting credit again. The same with Rumania, next on the Clark-Haig list for largesse. Default is sustained and serious pressure, and is not relief from pressure. Nor are we trying to recover money; we are trying to end martial law. The Reagan Administration is deliberately misinforming American taxpayers on this at great risk to its own credibility.

William Clark, hailed as a problem-solver, is thus creating great problems with his secrecy-sycophancy and alibi-cooking. For another example, take the case of William Van Cleave, a longtime policy adivser to candidate Reagan.

The outspoken Mr. Van Cleave was denied a job at State by Haig détenteniks and shut out of Defense by Frank Carlucci, the lie-detector King. As a sop to hard-liners, the campaign deputy to Richard Allen was named to head the advisory board on arms control, even after he made clear in writing he would continue to dissent on the MX decision.

This week, Mr. Clark called Mr. Van Cleave into the White House and said that even the sop would be denied. "The vote was 3 to 1," sympathized the new national security adviser. It seems that Messrs. Baker, Deaver and Meese—there's a bunch of foreign policy experts—had opposed Mr. Clark on the nomination. Soft-liner Percy's opposition turned out to be more important than hard-liner Eugene Rostow's support. Strangely, Ronald Reagan was never asked to cast a vote.

To conservatives, Mr. Clark put forward the alibi that only Mr. Van Cleave's publicly expressed dissent to MX blocked him from the post he had afterward been promised. That is demonstrably false, but as in the case of the Orwellian explication, Mr. Clark sticks to his story and further erodes his credibility.

What is Bill Clark's game? By pandering to the President's irritation with dissenters and whistle-blowers, he undermines the tottering troika; by tolerating the humiliation of Mr. Van Cleave, he gains the chance to substitute Donald Rumsfeld in that slot and thus to send a chill through Al Haig.

But he is not knowledgeable enough to take charge himself; no interviewers are permitted to probe his thoughts, thereby to suggest that still waters may run shallow. Why, then, is President Reagan bringing Mr. Clark along so fast?

My guess is that the President wants an amiable no-liner to make peace between the high-riding détenteniks and the gloomy hard-liners at Defense, so that he can continue to concentrate on those domestic challenges that interest him most. Next year, he may figure, will be time enough to bring in a second wave of foreign policy makers.

What a mistake. Americans threw out Jimmy Carter because they believed him to be uncertain and impotent on the world stage. Next year will be too late for the creation of a coherent foreign policy. Default, dear Brutus, is not in our advisers; as abuses grow and alibis fly, the blame is placed in the Oval Office.

DE-FAULTY LOGIC ON POLAND

The Reagan administration is resorting to twisted logic to defend its financial ballout of Poland's military dictators. Assistant Treasury Secretary Marc Leland said last Friday that declaring Poland in default of its loans would give its leaders an excuse to ignore its financial obligations. "The President has decided that maximum pressure can be put on Poland by insisting on repayment rather than declaring a default now," Mr. Leland said.

"Maximum pressure," we take it, consists for example of having U.S. taxpayers foot the bill for Poland's loans under the Agriculture Department's Commodity Credit Corp. The administration plans to pay $71 million to U.S. banks for Polish CCC loans that are already overdue. The U.S. government last year paid U.S. banks $158 million in guarantees on rescheduled Polish debt. Poland still has over $1.6 billion in outstanding CCC loans, some $300 million of which is due this year.

It now turns out that the administration's CCC decision is also of doubtful legality. The Capital Legal Foundation has developed a brief that the decision to repay the loans without a formal declaration of default violates the CCC's own rules and regulations. The rule required banks to first give notice of nonpayment, which might trigger the cross-default provisions in other loan agreements, and then for the government to confirm the finding before any government payment.

These rules were not followed in the case of Poland. Nor did the administration follow the established procedures for changing the rules, which provide that it must either publish the changes in the Federal Register and allow time for public comment, or specifically declare an emergency and explain why. The CCC of course defends its interpretation of the law, but the banks themselves are pondering the legality of the unorthodox arrangement, as well as certain CCC's changes in interest provisions, before deciding whether to accept the money. They have until Feb. 13 to decide.

Contrary to putting "maximum pressure" on the dictators in Warsaw and Moscow, the administration's actions permit the Communist bloc to escape—for at least a time—the harsh financial consequences to Poland's de facto default. A declaration of default would put intense financial and political pressure on the Communist bloc. Polish trade would probably come to a standstill, at least until a strict repayment plan was agreed on. Bankers would be forced to look more skeptically at all East bloc loans, depriving the Soviet economy, and indirectly its military machine, of the kind of infusion of credit it has enjoyed the last decade.

While the Reagan administration is reluctant to take such a strong step, several members of Congress are not. Senator Patrick Moynihan yesterday introduced a bill to declare Poland in default of all of its loan obligations to the U.S. Today Sen. Moynihan and Rep. Jerry Lewis plan to introduce floor amendments to a $5 billion supplemental appropriation for the CCC requiring the agency to abide by its own rules and to receive default notices before any payments are made on Poland's debt.

Thus Congress will have its chance to be heard. Perhaps it will have the courage of Mr. Reagan's convictions.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb. 3, 1982]

CONGRESS' CHANCE ON POLAND

It looks as if the battle for freedom in Poland is going to have to be taken to the floor of the U.S. Congress. With Ronald Reagan's administration slipping into tacit collaboration with martial law by making it easier for the Soviet bloc to finance repression, any serious action against the Polish regime will have to be taken by another branch of government.

It turns out that the administration, far from calling in the Polish debt to hamper the flow of credit to the Soviet Union and its satellites, is bending U.S. law to keep Poland out of bankruptcy. The Commodity Credit Corporation provides government guarantees to banks financing grain shipments abroad, offering to repay the banks if foreign governments cannot. For ordinary, non-Communist governments, no payment is made until the bank declares the loan in default. But in the case of Poland, this was deemed too embarrassing.

So the State Department lobbied to change the CCC rules, and the administration decided to pay off $71 million to the banks without their declaring a formal default. This is a down payment on about $400 million in guarantees on Polish loans due this year. No sooner is the decision taken than Secretary Haig rushes off to Chicago to spend Solidarity Day posturing before Polish voters as a tough guy on Poland.

One point that begs attention is how this decision was reached. At what level of the government was it decided? Did the President understand the full implications of the change in the rules? Did the National Security Adviser? Where was the Treasury? (The undersecretary for monetary affairs says he's under instructions not to discuss the issue.) Was the Defense Department even consulted? Was this the foreign policy equivalent of the decision to change the tax status of segregated private schools? Everything we learn leads us to suspect that the answers to these questions would be profoundly embarrassing, that this is another example of sloppy management at the White House.

A second point concerns the banks. They have refrained from declaring a default in Poland because the writedowns would hurt their earnings. It would also hurt their chances of dong new business with the Communist dictators of Poland and the rest of the Soviet bloc. But the real question is how did U.S. and other Western banks make all these bad loans, and how can we stop them from doing it again?

The banks have made the loans because Western governments encouraged them to do so, implicitly suggesting that loans to Communists had a favored position, deserved lower rates and would more or less be backed by Western governments. The CCC deal can only encourage this notion. The Soviets rushed to get the gas pipeline deal and other credits wrapped up before the Polish crackdown, and with the new incentives just demonstrated by the Reagan administration, the flow of credit will resume again as soon as the bad press dies down.

The U.S. government ought to at least stay neutral toward Communist loans. The Polish loans clearly are sick, and probably terminally so. The banks ought to be establishing large reserves against them—we have previously suggested 50%—as a matter of pure commercial prudence. The government ought to be encouraging them to do this, not helping them avoid it, to limit the commercial damage from any forceful foreign policy initiative. Instead, the Reagan administration sponsors a TV show.

Fortunately Congress will have an opportunity to show greater forcefulness, for it controls the power of the purse and bail-out money has to come from somewhere. Specifically, it would come from House Joint Resolution 389, a budget-busting supplemental appropriation of $5 billion for the CCC. This measure has been marked up—with unseemly haste—in the agriculture appropriations subcommittee by the Mississippi Democrat, Jamie Whitten. The main purpose is to provide pork for American farmers, who are calling on their CCC entitlements because of low farm prices. But a lot of the money—between $500 million and $1.5 billion, so far as we can learn—could be used to bail out repression in Poland.

It would not be the worst thing in the world if this whole supplemental were grounded, farm price supports being one of our least favorite subsidies to the landowning poor. But if Congress is going to bail out the American farmer, it can at least write in an amendment prohibiting the use of these tax funds to bail out Polish dictators, at least until a default is declared and the economic lessons of Poland digested.

TEXT OF AN ADDRESS BY AFL-CIO PRESIDENT LANE KIRKLAND TO THE INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS RESEARCH ASSOCIATION, DEC. 28, 1981, IN WASHINGTON, D.C.

I appreciate this opportunity to share some thoughts with you about some of the challenges the labor movement will face in the 1980s.

I share with the late Sam Goldwyn the conviction that one should never prophesy, especially about the future. I see tomorrow only through a glass darkly, and my vision clouds rapidly with further projections of time.

Neverthless, like everyone else here, I am often fascinated by the glib speculations on labor's future that enliven some journals. Unfortunately, I rarely find them useful in my line of work.

The stock lamentations about the dearth of "new ideas" are rarely, if ever, joined with any sign that the authors themselves have any more stirring or creative ideas than some variation on Taylorism or profit-sharing, notions that were already a bit moldy back when I quit going to sea for a living. To those critics, I can only respond with a plea, in the manner of one of Dickens' characters: "If you have any intelligence to convey, pray put me into the possession of it!"

One challenge I do not expect American labor to face in the 1980s is that now confronting the workers of Poland.

In that inspiring but hapless land, a military junta, fronting for the Soviet Union, has taken the reins of power from a disintegrating and discredited Communist Party, with the aim of crushing the first authentic and independent trade union movement to emerge in a Communist country.

Martial law has been declared.

General Jaruzelski holds Lech Walesa incommunicado. Polish workers have been murdered. Tens of thousands are reported detained in camps under harsh conditions. Communication lines have been cut, a news blackout imposed, and censorship restored.

How has the West responded?

The President—inpeccably armed with evangelical anti-Communist credentials—slapped the Polish government on the wrist and wrote to Mr. Brezhnev asking him to "permit" a restoration of human rights in Poland. For the first time in my memory, an American President has implicity recognized the Soviet Union's right to "permit" or withhold from Poland the basic human rights affirmed in the Helsinki Accord.

From the business community came the voice of Thomas Theobald, senior vice president in charge of Citibank's international division, who asked: "Who knows which political system works? The only test we care about is: Can they pay their bills?"

Once again, the American corporate and financial community exposes itself as the soft underbelly of freedom.

Our European allies are not inclined to undertake economic sanctions against the Soviet Union, and most are only reluctantly suspending credit to the Polish junta—raising doubts whether we have, in fact, an alliance that can survive the test of events in Poland.

The reluctance to use the potent economic, political and diplomatic weapons at our disposal is beguiled by wishful thinking and rationalized by the fallacy of false alternatives. The moderate, conciliatory speeches of General Jaruzelski are taken at face value in some quarters. Some are even tempted to seek redeeming value in his illegitimate, tyrannical regime—to see it as a preferred alternative to a Soviet invasion, as a stabilizing third force set between Moscow and an unruly Solidarity.

The AFL-CIO has informed the President that we do not accept this view. We have urged a series of strong measures—which I will not take the time to enumerate here—aimed at both the Polish government and the true authors of the crackdown, the Soviet Union. We hope the Administration will carefully weigh out proposals in the hours and days ahead. Time is running out.

We, for our part, will not rest until Lech Walesa and all other detainees are released, martial law is lifted, and negotiations are resumed between the Polish government and Solidarity.

Meanwhile, the Polish events put our labor problems in perspective: The President has used the full weight of his office to crush the air traffic controllers union, and no doubt there are others in our society who would like to see similar treatment meted out to the rest of the trade union movement.

But the AFL-CIO headquarters is not ringed by tanks, our Executive Council members are not in detention camps, we are free to assemble in our union halls, and we still have access to all communications channels.

No one was arrested for marching on Solidarity Day.

We are reminded by Poland of the unbreakable connection between trade union rights and human rights generally. Proven again is the raw truth that the destruction of freedom of association ends the capacity to defend and assert all other rights and freedoms.

If these observations strike you as somewhat afield of our topic, they are not. I am suggesting that among the challenges facing labor in the 80s is a shrinking and increasingly interdependent world in which, to quote Solzhenitsyn, there are no longer any internal affairs, and which will require more active and skillful trade union involvement in international affairs.

The AFL-CIO's re-entry into the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions—with which we have cooperated closely in assisting Solidarity—is recognition of this fact of present and future life. So is our renewed participation in the ILO, and the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the OECD, not to mention our affiliates' activities in the International Trade Secretariats, the pursuit of bilateral relations with other national labor centers around the world, and the maintenance of an active trade union foreign service, through our three institutes for Asia, Africa and Latin America.

On the domestic scene, our fundamental challenge comes from the profound economic and technological changes that are reshaping our society. These changes generate pressures not only on the labor movement but on all of our major institutions—the family, the university, religion, the press, the community and government at every level.

Let those who suggest that labor's success in responding has been less than brilliant show us any other American institution that has tried one-half as hard or done half as well.

In the last twenty years, all of these institutions have been judged to be in crisis. Institutional adjustments always lag behind the conditions that demand them. I would suggest that the more democratic the institution, the less dramatic its adjustments are perceived to be.

Take the universities—which, with all due respect, are inherently less democratic than trade unions. Hit in the 1960s by the postwar "baby boom," with all of its economic and cultural consequences, higher education expanded rapidly under stress, radical curricular experiments were initiated, and a political movement arose which proclaimed the university as the central agent of social change in American life.

The changes were dramatic and highly visible. As the baby boom receded, the turnabout was even more rapid. The expansion was reversed, federal aid curtailed, orthodoxy returned to the curricula, the campus upheaval simmered down and the breeding ground for revolution became, once again, the training ground for future employment.

No such changes were perceived to be taking place in the labor movement in these years. To many commentators, this was proof that the labor movement had become stodgy, old fashioned and unresponsive to changing times. Inasmuch as the university had responded to the changing times by becoming "radicalized," labor's academic critics tended to see labor's problems as an insufficiency of militancy and social vision, an ultimately self-defeating preoccupation with narrow bread-and-butter issues, a selfish pragmatism, an indifference to the historical mission others had assigned to it.

One is reminded of Lenin's words in his tract entitled "What Is To Be Done." There, he wrote:

"We said that there could not yet be Socialist consciousness among the workers. This consciousness can only be brought to them from without . . . The working class, relying solely on its own efforts, can only develop trade-union consciousness, i.e., it may by itself realize the need for combining in unions, to fight against the employers, and to try to force the government to pass needed labor legislation, et cetera . . .

"The theory of Socialism however grew out of the . . . theories that were developed by the educated representatives of the propertied classes, the intellectuals . . . The spontaneous labor movement is pure and simple trade unionism. Hence our task . . . is to combat spontaneity, to divert the labor movement, with its spontaneous trade-unionist tendencies . . . and bring it under the wing of revolutionary Socialism."

I believe these judgments were, and remain, irrelevant. They are irrelevant because they do not flow from an understanding of what the labor movement is; rather they misapply categories of thought developed in a different context.

An institution like the labor movement, representing a diverse cross-section of the American people, negotiating 180,000 collective bargaining agreements, and recruiting from work places and not from points on the ideological spectrum, is not likely to swing wildly from left to right and back again. An institution that fights for job security and for the economic means by which its members can participate fully in community life is not likely to advocate social upheaval and confrontationism for its own sake as the appropriate response to social change.

Late in the Carter years, after the Administration had wasted much precious time with academic nostrums such as tax-incentive pay-restraint schemes, jawboning and guidelines divined and enunciated by various emigres from Brookings, the AFL-CIO negotiated with the President and his agents an understanding that was entitled a "National Accord."

That Accord set forth the premises on the basis of which labor committed itself to participate fully in the common national effort to combat inflation, to distribute austerity and sacrifice equitably, and to resume the path of economic growth and revival, looking towards full employment. It proved that the American trade union movement, when reasonably approached and afforded the means and opportunity for full and effective participation, is prepared to share fully, in step with the rest of the national community, all the burdens of our times.

The Reagan Administration has taken all of the premises of that Accord, turned them upside down and stood them on their heads. Nevertheless, they remain sound and valid and represent the only approach to our national economic and social problems that holds any real promise of long-term success. Labor remains ready, willing and able to work with any Administration that will accept those principles and that approach. We shall, however, submit willingly to nothing that contravenes them.

If the radical misapprehensions of labor have receded with the times, they have left a residue which still influences less ideological commentaries.

There is still a tendency to see in labor's defeats evidence of labor's weaknesses rather than alarming signs of the growth of corporate power and increased employer resistance to unionism, signs which should trouble a democratic, pluralistic society.

Implicit in this tendency is the suggestion that if only labor had more will power, more dedication, or a bolder strategy, or a deeper vision, or whatever, we would win more and lose less.

It has become fashionable to speak of labor's "declining clout" in politics, or of labor's inability to "deliver" the workers' vote. Here again, we are haunted by the 30s notion that there is a monolithic working class vote which can be delivered by a vanguard labor movement. Presumably, if we are doing our job right, Jimmy Carter would be in the White House today and the Congress would be in Democratic hands.

The fact is that even our very good political machinery could not compensate for the deep divisions in the Democratic liberal camp or for the political climate that brought Ronald Reagan to Power.

This threat of reasoning—which exaggerates our power in order to deflate our egos—distorts the basic challenges confronting labor in this decade. It trivializes our problems—which are real and difficult—by reducing them to subjective or ideological issues, and downplays society's stake in them.

If the decline in manufacturing jobs has contributed to the decline of union membership as a percentage of the work force, it is not only the labor movement that has a problem. All of society needs to be alerted to the dangers inherent in the erosion of the nation's industrial base.

If the population shift to the Southeast and Southwest poses problems for us, it also poses problems for the Northeast and the Great Lakes region, where central cities are rotting, unemployment mounting, communities decaying and social problems proliferating.

The challenges we face are also opportunities.

The increased participation of women and minorities in the work force is an opportunity for the labor movement to reach out to these workers and to address their special concerns. We are doing that.

The shift in population offers an opportunity for us to join in coalitions with groups in the Northeast which are adversely affected, and at the same time to accelerate our organizing efforts in the Southeast and Southwest. We are doing just that in Houston where some 40 international unions are now cooperating in a coordinated organizing drive.

In the two decades leading up to 1978, union membership in the public sector tripled, and I expect to see this trend continue in the 80s.

Since 1978 there has been a sharp increase in the number of mergers among our affiliates, improving their efficiency and organizing capability. I expect that this trend, too, will continue, with the encouragement of the AFL-CIO.

The 1980s will see a major modernization of the labor movement's technical capacities for internal and external communication, enabling us to mobilize our forces more effectively around legislative issues and in political campaigns.

This year we will set up a labor institute for public affairs to provide our affiliates with expertise in telecommunication and other media skills, enabling us to mobilize our forces more effectively around public issues and in legislative, political and organizing campaigns.

We cannot control or direct all of the social and economic trends, at home and abroad, that bear on labor's prospects in the 80s.

We cannot, by ourselves, call forth new inventions or suppress labor-saving technologies.

We cannot command the snow to fall in the Sun Belt or the tropical breezes to warm New Hampshire in January.

We cannot by ourselves stop the concentration of corporate power, alter the balance of international trade, or summon social responsibility from an Administration wedded to a different philosophy.

But we never said we could—alone.

What we can do is what each generation of trade unionists has always had to do—to face up to the problems of inevitable change, to be vigilant for the new opportunities they present, to be diligent in representing the interests of the members, and to reach out to all who share our commitment to democratic values and to social and economic justice.

That's what we'll do in the 1980s, and I am confident we'll do it well.

Thanks for the use of the hall.

U.S.S.R. CALLS SANCTION "FLEA BITE"

(By Foreign Broadcast Information Service)

[Text] The discriminatory measures announced in Washington against the U.S.S.R. and Poland signify a desire to play a political game around the Polish events, an attempt to use those events to make international tension even greater. Commentary is by news analyst Vladimir Kazanskiy:

"It is a revealing fact that inside America today there is much criticism of the President's announcement of measures against the U.S.S.R. and Poland. The Wall Street Journal, for instance, notes that implementing the President's sanctions will cause the U.S. corporations considerable losses, whereas the Soviet Union can acquire in other countries all the products banned. Other U.S. periodicals quite justly consider that the administration has announced its measures without taking into account experience, in a rush, proceeding from the principle of reacting, no matter how.

"And, really, 2 years ago there was an experience. That happened when the then President Carter announced his measures aimed at punishing the Soviet Union, in his words for giving assistance to Afghanistan. Incidentally, that assistance was in response to numerous requests from Afghanistan's legitimate government and in accordance with the treaty of friendship between the U.S.S.R. and Afghanistan and the UN Charter. It is now apparent to all that Carter's attempts to put pressure on the U.S.S.R. failed totally; his actions hurt only the United States. And besides, as many historians note, Jimmy Carter's hasty decision was to a certain extent the cause of his losing the elections.

"And now the Californian Republican who succeeded the Georgian Democrat as the U.S. chief executive has come out with a statement on events in Poland, a statement that completely ignores what the United States had experienced earlier. The men in Washington don't want to put up with the fact that the Government of the Polish People's Republic has got down to the job of restoring law and order in the country, preventing Poland from sweeping into civil war and leading her away from the brink. All these measures, which come under the competence of the Polish state, were not to the liking of the U.S. administration, and so it decided to punish Poland and her ally, the Soviet Union.

"The top men of the administration, in their reasoning in connection with this, have shown no logic whatever. Instead there is an abundance of vicious anti-Sovietism and the feeling of helplessness in view of the fiasco of the attempt to push Poland off the socialist road, a feeling of bitterness at the failure of all those efforts to tear the Poles out of the socialist community.

"The flea bite that the administration is trying to present as punishing the Soviet Union for developments in Poland, will, just as 2 years ago, bring the United States nothing but damage to its own firms. After all, America's farmers most likely still remember the partial embargo on grain deliveries to the U.S.S.R., a measure that hit their interests and profits.

"By accusing the Soviet Union of mythical interference in Poland's internal affairs, President Reagan must have forgotten his country's unsavory record in terms of meddling in the home affairs of other countries. For as the New York Times has pointed out, Mr. Reagan's statement is more applicable to the atrocities committed by authorities in Guatemala, Chile, El Salvador, but the United States has not expressed to them indignation. For a political figure and the leader of a big country, a short memory is an unpardonable thing. It will not bring anything but humiliation to the United States and danger for Americans.

"In ancient times there used to be a saying to the effect that when the god of commerce, Mercury, exits, the god of war, Mars, rushes to step in. It is appropriate to recall this now when America, as an unreliable partner, so easily and thoughtlessly is destroying existing economic and trade links and is trying to hot up international tension."

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 7, 1982]

NO, IT WOULD ONLY HURT SOME FOOLISH BANKS

(By George F. Will)

Everyone needs a hobby, and Teddy Gleason's hobby is stiffening U.S. foreign policy. He is head of the International Longshoremen's Association, and if the Reagan administration will not seriously restrict trade with the Russian and Polish regimes that are brutalizing Poland's labor movement, Gleason's men may do it, as they have before.

Gleason's foreign policy would be a distinct improvement on the government's. The government has paid $71 million to U.S. banks in lieu of interest payments Poland owes on loans the U.S. government guarantees. The payment was contrary to the law, which requires prior notice of default. Indeed, the purpose of this surreptitious payment was to prevent Poland from being declared in default, which would disrupt East-West trade and efforts to resuscitate détente.

"The United States," says Secretary of State Alexander Haig, "has made it clear that we will not do business as usual with either Poland or the Soviet Union while repression in Poland continues." Indeed, it is highly unusual to ignore U.S. law in order to subsidize Poland's martial law. To do otherwise, Haig says, would "bring down the temple of Western unity." Temple? All that would be brought down would be the earnings of some foolish bankers.

Eastern Europe's economies, which help sustain Russia's war economy, have received Western loans four times the value of all American aid to Western Europe during the Marshall Plan. Russia is so pressed for hard currency it is asking Japanese and West German companies to stretch out payments for goods shipped to Russia. Yet, as The Wall Street Journal says, the administration is "slipping into tacit collaboration with martial law by making it easier for the Soviet bloc to finance repression."

Even before the $71 million payment, administration policy regarding Poland was dismally congruent with the general Western response, which The Economist magazine says will be remembered as the Great Handwringing of 1981-82. Democrats are noticing the opportunity to pluck from the administration's palsied grasp the falling flag of national honor, and to do so by opposing bankers on behalf of a large ethnic group.

Haig has had his way with the U.S. response to Poland's crisis and has become a hostage to fortune. He says the crisis has just begun and America must hold all serious measures in reserve for when the going gets rough. But what additional suffering by Poland could provoke action from people who worship at the "temple" of allied unity?

In Cuba, Russia long ago repealed the Monroe Doctrine and now, with the recent arrival of heavy bombers, advanced fighters and 63,000 tons of war material, it is shredding whatever is left of whatever agreement was reached at the end of the missile crisis 20 years ago. Haig is adamant, and correct, concerning the need for difficult decisions about El Salvador and the source of much other violence, Cuba. But he seems oblivious to certain problems inherent in the conduct of foreign policy in a democracy—oblivious to the practical consequences of symbolism, and to the demoralizing symbolism of America's policy regarding Poland.

Always, but expecially when the president is preoccupied with domestic policy, the nation needs a secretary of state with some of Dean Acheson's attributes—someone articulate, intellectual, elegant, ironic, at ease with himself, and justifiably confident of his ability to argue America's case before skeptical elites at home and abroad. The Achesonian combination of attributes is rare, but Haig's lack of them is a problem compounded by a policy toward Poland that is certain to confuse and paralyze the nation's will. In the early 1970's the rhetoric and other atmospherics of détente—the "end of the Cold War," "an era of negotiation, not confrontation," accords on "principles of conduct"—subverted public support for diplomatic and defense measures arduous enough to prevent détente from becoming what it became: a recipe for American retreat and an incitement to Russian expansionism. Haig then understood the problem and was a corrective force.

Today, administration policy regarding Poland is generating similar confusion and lassitude that will color defense and foreign policy debates generally. Haig argues that paying Poland's interest charges is really the "tough" policy because it keeps Poland under the burden of debt. That argument is entertainingly brassy, but it is too clever by half, which means it is not clever at all. Even if it were true, it would be politically unwise.

Someone who argues that subsidizing Poland's generals is toughness will find that when he turns to talking of other, more recognizable, forms of toughness in Central America, the public is not deferential, or comprehending, or even attentive.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I asked earlier to have several editorials from the Wall Street Journal printed in the RECORD. I remind the Senate that the Wall Street Journal understands this matter.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield briefly for a question?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I realize my colleague from Wisconsin is going to speak, but before he does I would like to ask the Senator about the amendment. It says in line 3:

Provided that none of the funds appropriated by this resolution may be available during any Fiscal Year in which (a) the Commodity Credit Corporation makes payments under loan guarantee or credit assurance agreements with respect to loans made or credits extended to Poland in the absence of a declaration of default,

Does that mean if the administration fails to declare Poland in default none of this money could be paid to American farmers during the year ending October 1, 1982?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. That is the essence of the meaning. But it is my understanding that the declaration of default comes from the lender not from the Government. Is that not correct? The lender whose loan is in default comes to the Commodity Credit Corporation and says, in effect, "Having breached one or more of the conditions of the loan, which you guaranteed he would pay, this particular borrower has defaulted on his loan and therefore may I collect?"

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand that. I think the Senator is correct. I misunderstood. The question then is if the administration goes ahead and makes any payments with respect to loans guaranteed to Poland, then——

Mr. MOYNIHAN. In the absence of a declaration of default?

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the absence of a declaration of default. Then, none of the funds appropriated by this resolution may be available?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Perhaps, though not necessarily. There is a second clause which I deliberately inserted in order to satisfy certain obvious concerns of the President. The amendment does stipulate that the $5 billion appropriated in this resolution would not be available if guaranteed Polish loans were repaid without a declaration of default, unless the President provided Congress with a statement that the national security interest of the United States has been served by such payments in such circumstances. The President may say to us "I am doing this in the interest of national security," and explain to us how his decision enhances the national security and he will retain the option to act as he desires.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So if the President does not comply with this, the farmers are the ones who are victimized, the farmers are hurt. It could be a cooperative in New York; it could be a wheat farm in Wisconsin or Nebraska or wherever.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I expect the administration would not allow that to happen if the way to prevent it were to explain, coherently and persuasively, if possible, its policies. The object of the amendment is to make them do what they should have done in the first place, which was to ask the lenders to assert what they would ask any lender anywhere in this country to assert had he lent money to an American firm when he comes in to collect his insurance.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I agree wholeheartedly with what the Senator is trying to do. I think the Senator is right. I followed Safire's column and the editorials in the Wall Street Journal. I think they are right. Nevertheless, the consequences are that if the administration disagrees with the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Wisconsin, and they do seem to disagree, then the American farmers are the ones who are going to be hurt and hurt directly.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator from Wisconsin knows full well a responsible administration would not do this. They will do what they should have done if the first instance, which is just to abide by the rules of the Commodity Credit Corporation and say, "We will pay you the moneys you have lost through this loan which we insured because you say the loan is in default." All they have to do is to say what is the fact, the loan is in default.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Why does the Senator not structure this so that the banks are the ones who would be victimized rather than the farmers? The banks are the ones who made the loan.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. There is no need for anyone to be victimized. The loans are guaranteed.

Mr. PROXMIRE. No need for it. But that is the consequence if the administration stands by a position which it takes with complete sincerity.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I wonder whether the administration will in fact long stand by this abominable policy. I tell the Senator I think the honor of the United States is involved here. I feel this as deeply as I have felt anything I have said on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It seems to me better to jeopardize the interests of the banks rather than the farmers who are the innocent victims.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The farmers will not be the victims. The farmers will get the $5 billion, and the Senator from Wisconsin knows it well.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Only if the administration knuckles under, in the manner the Senator from New York and this Senator from Wisconsin think they should do, but they will not do it.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Well, there are a lot of things that one knows can happen, even if one also knows full well they will not happen. What I am concerned about today is not the U.S. Government's policy toward farmers, who will receive the $5 billion we appropriate today, but the U.S. Government's shameful failure to respond adequately to the provocations of the Soviet Union, most especially in Poland.

I direct myself to the administration, and I ask the Senate to understand—and this will be my last word on the subject—that we invite the contempt of the totalitarians in behaving as we do, and that is a dangerous thing in a dangerous world.

I see my distinguished and learned friend from Wisconsin, the junior Senator, is on the floor. He joins me in offering this amendment and I am happy to yield to him if it is his wish at this point to address the Senate.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I will yield very briefly to the Senator from Utah for just a moment. He said he had a brief statement he wanted to make on this question.

Mr. GARN. I appreciate my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin doing that because I do have people waiting for me.

I would like to just make one point very strongly, if I may. I do not rise necessarily to disagree with my two colleagues from New York or Wisconsin on this amendment. They may turn out to be absolutely correct that default is the proper thing to do. But, as chairman of the Banking Committee, and having been studying this issue and having had staff work on it for several weeks, it is a very complex issue.

All of the answers are not necessarily obvious. We are having a battle between some Members of the House, the Senate, the Defense Department, the State Department, and the administration on what should be done. Unfortunately, no one quite knows that it means to call for default in an international context. It has never been done.

Instead, the practice has been to reschedule and roll over outstanding debt in arrears. Our biggest problem is, with the Siberian pipeline is, our allies have indicated that they will not join with us, so we may cut off credit and they may not. Unfortunately, there is nothing of value for us to seize, as I see it, and this is another example of the failure and of the disarray of the alliance.

So as a result of this study, I did not publicly announce and I did not intend to until the witnesses were lined up, but I intended to have a very extensive hearing in the Banking Committee because of the obvious jurisdiction over loans and financial credit, and all of those things of the committee, and to ask those questions as what should default really mean? How much leverage do we have over the Soviet and Polish regimes through credit? How much leverage do we have over our allies? What would be the consequences of a hard or soft line by the United States? Can the German banking system absorb a $5 billion default? Can the world's banking system sustain a $27 billion default? How would a default affect East-West trade? Do we want to see a quick economic recovery led by the new military regime?

What degree of conditionality should be imposed?

These are just thoughts that I was able to bring up quickly when I heard this come up. But I know a lot more, and I will not impose more on the time of my friend from Wisconsin. But my first reaction was just as we heard today, default, try to punish them.

The more I looked into it and started talking with various people in the financial community, the answers were not quite so obvious. So my only opposition to doing it today is it is premature.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. May we have order? The chairman of the Banking Committee is speaking on an important matter.

Mr. GARN. It may be the right thing to do. All I am saying is until I have the answers to these questions I would like to call these witnesses, and I simply think it is premature. We may cause some unwise side effects that we do not want to.

So I want to make it clear that my two colleagues may be absolutely right. I hate to do it on the floor of the Senate in a nongermane amendment on a bill coming through late in the afternoon without these answers first, and without some extensive hearings.

I thank my colleague from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) be added as cosponsors of our amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today the Senate has a chance to put teeth into the official U.S. reaction to martial law in Poland; 5,000 Poles have been detained without charge and without accounting. Martial law has been imposed, movement toward democracy has been crushed, and Stalinistic repression of the Polish people continues. The West has responded with a great deal of hand-wringing and a few ineffective trade sanctions. The Polish military regime cracks down, and we respond by sponsoring a TV show.

I understand the emergency nature of this CCC supplemental, and it is my strong desire that this bill be sent to the President before Congress adjourns. In that regard I appreciate, and I respect the comments of my senior Senator from Wisconsin. If we act on the amendment tonight, and if it were to be adopted, we could still complete action on it and it could then be acted on by the House of Representatives tomorrow. The $5 billion would not be held up; so I hope we can get this amendment voted on up or down so that we can go into a conference with the House.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KASTEN. I would be pleased to yield.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. There are some important foreign policy implications here. This morning we held hearings in the Foreign Operations Subcommittee on this subject. The very concerns that the Senator from Utah mentioned were addressed: How this is going to be handled, and how it can be worked out, were discussed today by representatives from Treasury, State, Agriculture, and Defense. I understand that none of the money in this bill will be used to pay guarantees to U.S. banks for their bad loans to Poland. But that simply means some other CCC funds are being used to bail out the banks, instead of being used to help American farmers. I for one do not believe our farmers want their program used to bail out banks, the repressive Polish military regime, or indirectly, the Soviet Union.

There are also some serious legal questions to be answered. The CCC's own rules and regulations require the banks to give notice of default, and for the Government to confirm that finding, before any CCC payment is made. These rules and regulations are not being followed in the case of Poland. Mr. President, an independent law foundation has developed a brief which concludes that the decision to repay the loans without a formal default violates CCC regulations. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this brief be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

FEBRUARY 5, 1982.

To: File.
From: Capital Legal Foundation.
Re: Commodity Credit Corporation offer to Repurchase Polish Debt.

FACTS

On Friday, January 29, 1982, the Department of Agriculture's Commodity Credit Corporation ("CCC") telexed an offer to ten banks and two exporters to "repurchase its outstanding obligations under the assurance agreements and payment guarantees (collectively 'guarantees') issued pursuant to its GSM-101 Noncommercial Risk Assurance Program and GSM-102 Export Credit Guarantee Program regulations (collectively 'regulations'), respectively, covering commercial credits extended to obligors of the Polish People's Republic (Poland)." (Attachment 1). The press reported on Sunday, January 31, 1982, that the Department of Agriculture ("USDA") had passed, in secret, an emergency regulation that would allow the U.S. government to pay over $71 million of principal and interest owed to U.S. banks by Poland. New York Times, Jan. 31, 1982, at 1. In fact, as we were informed by a USDA official on Wednesday, February 3, no such "emergency regulation" was passed. The CCC, the governmental agency actually insuring the loans, offered on its own initiative to make this payment without requiring or receiving a declaration of Poland's default by the insureds.

CCC made this offer, unofficially, to eliminate the possibility that one of the insured's might declare Poland in default. Instead, CCC offered to pay part of the insured's loans so that they would be in the same position as if they had declared the loans in default and then applied to the CCC for coverage under their political risk policies. Thus this CCC offer constituted a maneuver to repay the export creditors with U.S. funds rather than funds from Poland, or the Soviet Union, without risking the consequences that might attend a formal declaration of default. Among these possible harms are a chain reaction of default declarations, a temporary interruption of East-West trade, and the difficulty anticipated in ultimately recovering the remaining uncollateralized amounts due following a formal declaration of default.

The contract that will be created if the insureds' accept CCC's offer will obligate the U.S. government to pay all outstanding obligations, that is amounts due from Poland and guaranteed under either the GSM-101 noncommercial risk assurance program or the GSM-102 export credit guarantee program. The guaranteed amount presently overdue form Poland is estimated at $71.3 million. Furthermore, until the CCC terminates the contract, the U.S. government would be obligated to pay all additional amounts that become due to the insureds and are unpaid by Poland. An additional $135 million is due from Poland through April of 1982. Of the $3.2 billion in outstanding Polish loans owed to U.S. interests, $1.7 billion are in loans and guarantees from the CCC.

The CCC's offer does not affect the total amount of Polish debt guaranteed by the U.S. government. The offer does, however, seek to modify the conditions that would trigger the CCC's obligation to pay its insureds. Under the terms of its offer, CCC proposes to repurchase outstanding obligations owed by Poland upon acceptance of the offer and the terms therein, without requiring notice of default as provided in the rules governing the loan guarantee programs. This "offer" expires on February 13, 1982. As of February 4, the insureds involved had not responded to the offer.

ISSUES

1. Does the CCC have the authority, under existing law, to offer to repurchase outstanding CCC obligations under the GSM-101 and GSM-102 programs, when the terms of the offer relieve the creditors of the obligation to declare the loans in default?

2. If CCC has such authority, were proper procedures followed in exercising the authority in this instance?

CONCLUSION

CCC's offer to repurchase the outstanding Polish obligations contravenes the express procedures and requirements of the regulations governing the GSM-101 and GSM-102 programs, and as such is invalid. The CCC has not followed the procedures required to change the regulations.

ANALYSIS

The CCC, a government-chartered corporation, has broad statutory power to act in ways that, inter alia, increase and encourage U.S. export sales of agricultural products. 15 U.S.C. § 714c(f). Additionally, its general powers under the statute that created the corporation give it the power to "adopt, amend, and repeal bylaws, rules and regulations" controlling how its business is to be conducted and its powers exercised. 15 U.S.C. § 714b(d). CCC also has the power to "enter into . . . such contracts or agreements as are necessary in the conduct of its business." 15 U.S.C. § 714b(g).

Regulations governing the GSM-101 Noncommercial Risk Assurance Program and the GSM-102 Export Credit Guarantee Program were issued in 1978 and 1980, respectively. 43 Fed. Reg. 4033; 45 Fed. Reg. 64898. These two programs contain detailed and specific regulations governing the procedure for payment by the CCC in the event that an obligor fails to pay. 7 C.F.R. § 1487.1, et seq. (GSM-101); 1493.1, et seq. (GSM-102). The agreement signed by the insured and the CCC is made expressly subject to the regulations governing these two programs. (Attachment 2).

In its offer, CCC proposes to repurchase assurance agreements and payment guarantees. An assurance agreement is defined in § 1487.2(c) as "the written agreement under which CCC undertakes . . . to protect the exporter or assignee from defaults by a foreign bank caused by noncommercial risks under the foreign bank's letter of credit supporting the exporter's export credit sales contract or under the foreign bank's related obligation under its letter of credit to the exporter." Under § 1487.8, entitled "Notice of Default," the regulations state that if the foreign bank fails to make a remittance as called for by the CCC/backed agreement, "the exporter or assignee shall promptly furnish a written notice of default" to the CCC. Within 30 days, the obligee must file a claim for loss containing certain information, including "(a) certification that the scheduled payment has not been received," 7 C.F.R. § 1487.8(b)(2). The regulations further state that: "Upon receipt of the information required under § 1487.8 . . . CCC shall promptly determine whether or not a loss has occurred for which CCC is liable." 7 C.F.R. § 1487.9(a).

The regulations governing GSM-102 parallel the provisions described above and are characterized by CCC as a "Guarantee Against Default." These regulations contain the requirements, noted above, that upon failure of a creditor to make a payment when due, the creditor "shall notify CCC" and that notice is to include the "reason for the default if known." 7 C.F.R. § 1493.8(a). Under GSM-102 the creditor also must file a claim for loss which includes a certification that "payment has not been received." 7 C.F.R. § 1493.8(b)(2). Subsequently, but only upon "receipt of the information" specified above, CCC is to determine its liability, if any, for the losses claimed. 7 C.F.R. § 1493.9(a).

Thus the regulations, and by express incorporation the risk assurance agreements and the credit guarantee agreements, provide that a notice of default, a claim for loss, and certain required documents must be filed with the CCC before the government is obliged to pay its insurance commitments.

CCC's offer to the insureds, by contrast, requires insureds to submit only part of the information called for by the regulations, and significantly omits the requirement that the banks certify that payment has not been received. Acceptance of the offer actually bars creditors from filing notices or claims as prescribed by the regulations. As a result, if the banks accept this offer, no notice of default will be forthcoming, nor will CCC receive the information required by the regulations before it determines its liability and agrees to make payment. The CCC's offer is, therefore, not in conformance with its own regulations, and it is thus ultra vires and invalid.

Moreover, the CCC has made no attempt to amend its regulations nor does its offer purport to modify the regulations. The Administrative Procedure Act requires each agency to publish in the Federal Register "statements of the general course and method by which its functions are channeled and determined, including the nature and requirements of all formal and informal procedures available," "substantive rules of general applicability adopted as authorized by law, and statements of general policy or interpretations of general applicability formulated and adopted by the agency" and "each amendment, revision, or repeal of the foregoing." 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(1)(B), (D), (E). Furthermore, the APA provides for notice and public participation prior to the enactment of agency rules of changes to such rules. 5 U.S.C. § 553.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL SERVICE
Washington, D.C.

SUBJECT: CCC's Offer to All Holders of GSM-101 Assurance Agreements and GSM-102 Payment Guarantees Covering Credits to Poland.

The Commodity Credit Corporation ("CCC") hereby offers to repurchase its outstanding obligations under the assurance agreements and payment guarantees (collectively "guarantees") issued pursuant to its GSM-101 Noncommercial Risk Assurance Program and GSM-102 Export Credit Guarantee Program regulations (collectively "regulations"), respectively, covering commercial credits extended to obligors of the Polish People's Republic (Poland).

The following definitions apply for purposes of this offer. "Obligation" is defined as a member of the series of obligations of CCC under its guarantees to pay a specified portion of a payment due to the exporter or the exporter's assignee (hereinafter the "holder" as appropriate) in the event of a default of such payment by the Polish obligor, with each obligation corresponding to a separate payment. Such obligation is outstanding if the corresponding payment has not yet been paid in full. Principal and interest due on the same date constitute one payment. All periods of time are in calendar days unless otherwise specified. "Credit" includes agreements related to the commercial letter of credit issued by the Polish obligor. The due date of an obligation's corresponding payment is that date submitted to CCC as part of the final payment schedule for the credit to Poland, including any amendments to that schedule. All interest amounts paid by CCC will be calculated on the basis of a 365-day year.

This offer is subject to the following terms and conditions:

(1) This offer must be accepted within 15 days of the date of this offer. Acceptance will be effective for all outstanding obligations for all guarantees held by the holder covering credits to Poland until terminated as provided in paragraph (9) below.

(2) If this offer is accepted, for each obligation outstanding at the time of election under paragraph (3) below, CCC offers holders the choice of two options:

(a) CCC will repurchase the obligation at a price equal to the full amount of CCC's obligation. Repurchase of this obligation will extinguish all liability of CCC for the corresponding payment.

The holder must assign to CCC all right, title, and interest in the credit (including the right to charge interest at the rate provided in the credit for delinquent amounts) to the Polish obligor for the full amount of the corresponding payment, including any amounts not covered by CCC's guarantee. CCC will pro-rate any collections made from the Polish obligor between the holder and CCC based on the ratio of guaranteed and unguaranteed amounts of the payment. CCC may determine the terms and conditions of the obligor's repayment and may charge interest at a rate lower than the rate provided in the credit for delinquent amounts, OR

(b) CCC will repurchase the obligation at a price equal to the full amount of the principal component of the corresponding payment only. Repurchase of this obligation will extinguish all liability of CCC for the corresponding payment, including the interest component, if any.

The holder must assign to CCC all right, title, and interest in the credit (including the right to charge interest at the rate provided in the credit for delinquent amounts) to the Polish obligor for the full amount of the principal component of the corresponding payment only. The holder will retain all right, title, and interest to the amount of the credit not assigned to CCC under this option.

(3) For each outstanding obligation, the holder must notify the Treasurer, CCC, as to which option it has elected no later than 28 days after the due date of the corresponding payment or 28 days after acceptance of this offer, whichever is later, or such other date as is approved by the Treasurer of CCC. If the notice of election is not received prior to the appropriate date, CCC's obligation for the corresponding payment will lapse and all of CCC's liability under that obligation will be extinguished. The holder's notice of election may not be submitted to CCC more than 35 days prior to the due date of the corresponding payment.

(4) The holder's notice of election must be in writing and must be accompanied by the documents specified in 7 CFR 1487.8(b)(3)(i), (iii), and (iv) if the obligation was issued under GSM-101, or 7 CFR 1493.8(b)(3) if issued under GSM-102, unless otherwise agreed to by the Treasurer, CCC.

(5) CCC agrees to pay the holder of each obligation repurchased in accordance with this offer interest on the purchase price determined under paragaph (2) above. For obligations issued under GSM-101, interest will accrue beginning 31 days after receipt of the documents and notice of election that comply with the terms and conditions of this offer, or 32 days after the due date of the corresponding payment, whichever is later, and will continue to accrue until payment by CCC. Interest shall accrue at the New York Federal Reserve Discount Rate in effect on the due date of the corresponding payment.

For obligations issued under GSM-102, interest will accrue beginning one day after receipt of the documents and notice of election that comply with the terms and conditions of this offer, or two days after the due date of the corresponding payment, whichever is later, and will continue to accrue until payment is made by CCC. Interest shall accrue at the latest rate of the bond equivalent of the 52 week U.S. Treasury bill auction average as published by the Department of the Treasury on or prior to the due date of the corresponding payment.

(6) The holder agrees, by acceptance of this offer, that the holder will not submit notices or claims pursuant to 7 CFR 1487.8 of GSM-101 or 7 CFR 1493.8 of GSM-102 for obligations whose corresponding payments are due from Polish obligors prior to the effective date of termination of the contract formed by acceptance of this offer.

(7) CCC reserves its rights to proceed against the holder and/or the exporter for breach or violation of the holder's and/or exporter's obligations or warranties undertaken pursuant to the regulations.

(8) The holder agrees to retain, for CCC audit and inspection, for three years after the expiration of the guarantee, the records and documents which had to be retained under the applicable regulation.

(9) CCC may terminate the contract formed by acceptance of this offer at any time by notifying the holder by telex or other written form. The termination will be effective for those obligations with corresponding payments due on or after the date of such notification of termination, or such later date as may be specified in such notification.

(10) Acceptance must be by telex or other written form to the Treasurer, CCC, U.S. Department of Agriculture, P.O. Box 2415, Washington, D.C. 20013. This offer must be accepted before submitting any notice of election under paragraph (3) above.

SECTION III—APPROVAL

In consideration of the payment of the assurance fee and in reliance upon the statements and declarations of the assured, and subject to the provisions of the CCC Non-Commercial Risk Assurance Program (GSM-101) regulations (7 CFR 1487 et seq.) and such supplemental announcements and amendments thereto as are now in effect, CCC hereby accepts the assured's application for Non-Commercial Risk Assurance covering the export credit sale described above and agrees to pay, in U.S. dollars, to the assured or his assignee an amount not to exceed the assured value if there is a default in payment due to the occurrence of a "Non-Commercial Risk" under the foreign bank letter of credit securing the export sale or related obligation under the foreign bank letter of credit.

SECTION III—APPROVAL

In consideration of the payment of the guarantee fee and in reliance upon the statements and declarations of the exporter, and subject to the provisions of the CCC Export Credit Guarantee Program (GSM-102) regulations (7 CFR 1493 et seq.) and such supplemental announcements and amendments thereto as are now in effect, CCC hereby accepts the application for GSM-102 Payment Guarantee covering the export sales described above and agrees to pay, in U.S. dollars, to the exporter or its assignee an amount not to exceed the guaranteed value plus eligible interest if there is a default in payment under the foreign bank letter of credit securing the export sale or the related obligation calling for deferred payment in U.S. dollars from the banking institution issuing the letter of credit to a financial institution in the United States.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KASTEN. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Does this brief suggest that the payment would be illegal?

Mr. KASTEN. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I think the Government would be doing something illegally.

Mr. KASTEN. The U.S. Government, because we did not give notice of default, is in fact misusing that money and has violated Federal regulations.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. What the Senator from Wisconsin is asking is not something necessarily extraordinary. He is asking the U.S. Government to obey the law.

Mr. KASTEN. Obey the law and regulations as written, and before we obligate any funds, declare the loans in default.

But Mr. President, we must not allow ourselves to get bogged down in the details of default. Let us stop for a moment and consider the real, underlying issue. For years, our trade and economic relationships with the Soviet block countries have hardly been in our own best interest. The benefits of expanded trade with the West were supposed to be dependent upon Soviet "good behavior." And the Soviet Union has certainly benefited by using its East European allies as a conduit for Western goods and technology—essentially forcing those countries to absorb the hard currency debts that the Soviets would otherwise be forced to pick up. When Poland's debt payments were stretched out in April of last year, Western creditors included a so-called "tank" clause, calling for default in the event of "exceptional circumstances" like internal repression. Now that these "exceptional circumstances" have occurred—and there is no question but that they have—and in testimony this morning from Defense, State, Agriculture, and Treasury, all admitted "exceptional circumstances" had occurred. Tanks have not come across the border, but we do have 5,000 people detained without accounting. "Exceptional circumstances" are occurring right at this moment. And now that these "exceptional circumstances" have occurred, the trade that was intended to bind East and West "with hoops of gold" is binding our own hands instead.

Some administration officials actually argue that by declaring Poland in default, we would cause financial havoc in the rest of Eastern Europe, which in turn would rain havoc upon Western financial institutions and governments. The inference is—and I find this incredible—that we must continue to prop up the military government of Poland and the rest of Eastern Europe in order not to cause damage to our own financial institutions.

Our seeming paralysis on the question of default just underscores our credibility crisis abroad. U.S. threats to use the economic measures available to us—to deny the East the benefits of trade—no longer carry any weight. They are not credible to our adversaries or to our allies. I maintain that a declaration of Polish default would help restore that missing credibility. It would simply do what we said we would do—what all the Western creditors said they would do—under the "exceptional circumstances" or "tank" clause of the debt rescheduling agreement. It is clear what we should do.

Besides the credibility aspect, default would aggravate the financial strains already apparent in the Soviet economy and make it more difficult for them to continue their unprecedented military buildup.

This is the key point that has been argued by many in this administration as they have sought default.

Many Senators have expressed their deep concern about the Soviet natural gas pipeline. The pipeline will provide an unprecedented flow of Western money into the Soviet Union, helping to alleviate their own hard currency problems. It will help them develop resources they could not develop as quickly without Western technology and know-how. At the same time, it will increase West European dependence, especially psychological dependence, on the Soviet Union. A declaration of default would affect both the willingness and the ability of our allies to go ahead, and I believe this may be the least controversial way of stopping this natural gas pipeline.

Mr. President, this amendment would simply require the CCC to declare Poland in default before any of the funding in this supplemental is expended. It would not threaten the CCC supplemental or require a House-Senate conference—there is a great deal of support for this kind of amendment in the House. I believe if there had been an up-or-down vote in the House rather than a motion to recommit, which was prevented by the rules, it would have been accepted. We simply need to pass this amendment in the Senate and send it to the House and then to the President before we adjourn tomorrow evening.

Nearly 2 months have passed since martial law was imposed in Poland. The "exceptional circumstances" clause of the Polish debt rescheduling agreement has been met. The Polish Government is technically in default on loans to almost all of its creditors. What does America gain by this delay? Mr. President, I say the time to declare Poland in default is now.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I congratulate my colleague from New York, joined in cosponsorship by the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Indiana, for bringing this serious matter to the attention of the U.S. Senate. I share their concern for the fact that the administration has not taken the proper course, in my opinion, and evidently in theirs, with regard to the default in the loans to Poland.

I will simply say that I rise in opposition, in strong opposition, to the amendment for what it would do to the American farmer. As I understand this, Mr. President, this amendment, or something very much like it, was offered and defeated today on the floor of the House of Representatives. If this amendment should pass here and the appropriation would go forward, it would require a conference with the House of Representatives and delay as a result thereof.

Mr. President, earlier, when the measure was first introduced, I cited the fact that timing was of critical importance to the American farmer, because right now or tomorrow we are going to run out of money in the Commodity Credit Corporation fund. Therefore, while the points have been made, and have been made well by the Senator from New York and the cosponsors of this amendment, it has been further complicated by the statement that has been made by the chairman of the Banking Committee. And I say to my colleagues that this is not a time when we should attack even a legitimate problem with the administration's handling of our loan commitments to Poland or the failure of Poland to pay interest on that legitimate debt.

I am just saying, let us not confuse the situation that confronts us now, which is simply to provide this additional $5 billion for the Commodity Credit Corporation, and allow us to deal at a later time with any shortsightedness on the part of the administration with regard to handling this particular portion of our foreign policy in particular and foreign policy in general, nor should we get this matter involved with the difficulties in the banking system nor with regard to the pipeline that we are all very much concerned about that is supposed to come from the Soviet Union into Europe.

Let us keep foreign policy and banking matters out of this matter that is critically necessary to make loans available under the 1981 Farm Act that we passed here to the American farmer.

Mr. President, in closing, I would simply say that if, indeed, we accept this amendment and then the $5 billion additional appropriation that came over to us from the House of Representatives goes into conference, and even should the conference agree and the measure, as amended, would go to the President of the United States, I think there may be some signals being sent in some other things that I have heard that this would be unnecessarily bloodying the nose of the President of the United States on the Polish matter when he is presently considering it.

Under those circumstances, it would not surprise me if the President of the United States would veto this bill. If that would happen, it would cause great concern in the farm belt.

Therefore, let us keep the measure clean. Those of us who are concerned first about the American farmer, I think we should not allow this measure to be amended regardless of how we feel about the handling of the Polish loan situation and the general crisis there. I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. COCHRAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I know that these are legitimate issues for the Senate to discuss—the matter of loans to Poland; whether or not default should be declared; how collections of interest and principal should be pursued; and, whether by private banks or the U.S. Government. These are all legitimate issues that should receive the attention of the Senate. For instance, the Senator from Wisconsin had hearings this morning on this subject.

But I think it would be very unwise, Mr. President, for the Senate to act precipitously, because this is a complex issue. It is extremely important to the foreign policy of the U.S. Government and to the people of Poland. If we act quickly, without being fully advised of all the consequences that could flow from the adoption of the Moynihan amendment, it could be an action that could be long regretted by this body.

The purpose of the resolution before the Senate, Mr. President, is simply to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for net realized losses, losses that have occurred to date. There are no contemplated future losses that are reimbursable under the language of this resolution. So what we really become involved in now is a debate of two separate issues. They are not related.

The action the other body took earlier today was to adopt a resolution to reimburse the CCC to the extent of $5 billion so that farm programs could be operated under the terms of the law; that those who were entitled to benefit from the grain reserve program, from the dairy program, and from the cotton and rice deficiency payment obligations, could count on receiving those benefits. These are assurances that have been given to those who are involved in those programs by this Government.

To default on those obligations, not to meet the obligations by failing to pass this legislation or by complicating it by involving another issue—the question of Polish indebtedness and loans to Poland—would certainly be unfortunate.

This is an urgent matter. The House is scheduled to go out of session tomorrow at some point. They will be in tomorrow, but after they conclude their business tomorrow, as I understand it, they will be going out of session for the Lincoln holiday. This means, with their having already acted on a similar amendment today and not adopting it, we have no assurance that they would go along with an amendment such as this that would be adopted by the Senate. That means the probability of a conference would be great, and the outcome of that conference would certainly be anyone's guess.

The point is that if this matter were delayed beyond tomorrow, then the Commodity Credit Corporation is going to just shut down. It will not have the authority to continue to operate and meet its obligations to those whom I have mentioned are entitled to payments—to reimbursements that are provided and directed by law to be made.

Mr. President, I urge, in the strongest possible way, that while it is certainly appropriate to discuss this issue in the Senate—and I have no quarrel with any Senator who wants to bring this matter up for a full discussion—this does not seem to be the appropriate vehicle for the adoption by the Senate of language that would set policy in this area.

I know the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has strong feelings about it, and there may be others who are certainly more fully advised about the possible consequences of such action than this Senator.

I would hope that we could reject this amendment, Mr. President, and move to the adoption of the joint resolution as it came to us from the other body.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as for the pending amendment, this Senator from North Carolina feels that a bit of chronology may be helpful if for no other reason than to have it as a matter of record.

Mr. President, the New York Times on February 1, reported that the U.S. Government will repay $71 million due on debts owed by the Government of Poland. The Times stated that "the U.S. Government, which had guaranteed the loans, did not require the banks to declare Poland in default.

The Times article further states that the decision to pay the debts of the Government of Poland with U.S. tax dollars "puts in place a policy that would permit the administration to repay, also without any formal declaration of default by the banks involved, $396.5 million of guaranteed debts that Poland is obligated to repay by the end of this year."

A policy which takes the hard-earned tax dollars of American citizens and pays off the debts of the Communist dictatorship in power in Poland is not my idea of a policy that the American people would have expected the administration to permit when they elected Ronald Reagan to the Presidency in November 1980. In my judgment, it is a policy the American people would not have tolerated then and will not tolerate now. It is a policy that the Senate must exert every effort to reverse, if indeed it is the policy of our President.

Mr. President, it is very difficult to get the facts in this situation. The facts have been carefully guarded. But the newspapers have been filled with many reports of the details, and this city, and the city of New York, are ripe with rumors. So in attempting to describe the situation, it is necessary to make certain suppositions until the facts are established.

Let us suppose, as was reported in the Wall Street Journal of Friday, January 8, 1982, that Poland owes between $31 and $35 billion to Western banks.

Let us suppose that the Soviet bloc, as reported in the same article, in total owes between $123 and $140 billion to Western banks.

If our supposition is correct, then the West has in large measure provided the hard currency reserves used by the Soviet bloc in financing the largest armed force ever known in the history of man. If our supposition is correct, then Western banks are underpinning the repressive dictatorship of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski.

Many Americans, if the Wall Street Journal article is correct, undoubtedly would wonder what share of the funds provided to these Communist governments has been provided by banks in the United States.

In the case of Poland, let us suppose that the amount owed American banks is about $1.8 billion and the additional amount owed to, or guaranteed to, the Government of the United States itself is $1.6 billion. Those figures, while relatively small, would, I believe astonish the American people who would not understand why their banks have propped up the Polish regime or the regimes of other Communist dictatorships.

The American people would wish to know the names of the banks in the United States who have seen fit to lend money to the dictatorship in Poland.

Let us suppose as reported that those banks are Chase Manhattan, the Marine Midland Bank, Bankers Trust, Manufacturers Hanover Trust, First Fidelity Bank, City Corp., the Crocker Bank of San Francisco, and the Continental Bank of Illinois. Let us suppose further that there is even a small bank in Tulsa, Okla., which has lent 17 percent of its net worth to the Government of Poland and that the largest amount given Poland was provided, ironically, by the Bank of America.

Let us suppose further that neither the Department of the Treasury, the Federal Reserve Board, nor the Controller of the Currency have taken any action to require American banks to accelerate their reserves against a potentially bad Polish debt not have they forbidden further lending to Poland.

Let us further suppose that the small amount of Soviet provided debt service, reported in the press as $350 million, to be paid by Poland to Western banks has been paid, in fact, first to banks in Austria and Switzerland while American banks wait at the end of the line.

If these suppositions are correct, then the American people would no doubt be outraged.

But there is more that is subject to speculation. Let us suppose that in March 1981, the Government of the United States in conjunction with American banks and members of the so-called Paris Club of Western lending nations agreed with Poland to reschedule the Polish debt so that only 10 percent of that debt would be due during 1981.

Let us suppose, however, that our Government incorporated in that agreement a clause which gave our Government absolute discretion to accelerate the Polish debt and demand full payment with interest, upon the happenings of exceptional circumstances such as the imposition of martial law.

Let us suppose further that on January 15, the members of the Paris Club formally found that exceptional circumstances did exist, but that the exceptional circumstances clause would not be invoked.

Let us suppose, finally, that the National Security Council recently sent notification to the Commodity Credit Corporation instructing the Commodity Credit Corporation to make sure that American banks seeking payment for defaulted loans to Poland did not declare a formal default even while noting default in order to secure payment with American tax dollars.

If those suppositions are correct, as indicated in the New York Times, then the American people, I am confident, would want to know why their Government is protecting the credit rating of the Polish dictatorship even while paying off its defaulted debts with American tax dollars.

European banks, at the direction of their governments, may well have already begun the process of preparing for a Polish default by accelerating reserves under the guidance of their central banks. The assertion that the Western banking system would collapse after a declaration of Polish default is not supported by the facts. While it is true that some banks, for example the Dresdner Bank of West Germany, which have made imprudent loans to Poland would undoubtedly suffer, those banks have benefitted from high interest paid by Poland and should bear the risk associated with their profits rather than transfer those risks to taxpayers and ordinary citizens in the United States or in other Western nations.

Mr. President, I have a memorandum prepared for me in my capacity as chairman of the Agriculture Committee with respect to two areas of funding responsibility for CCC in terms of Poland.

The first area is the direct export credits and the second is loan guarantees.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that memorandum be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM: POLISH DEBTS

There are two areas of funding responsibility for CCC in terms of Poland:

1. Direct export credits.
2. Loan guarantees.

Direct export credits are credits from CCC to the Polish government. $285.1 million will be due in fiscal year 1982, $75.7 million in fiscal year 1983. Payments due in fiscal year 1981 of $217.3 million have been "rescheduled".

Loan guarantees are guarantees, by CCC, of loans made by commercial banks, to Poland. If defaults occur on those loans it is the American banking community who is harmed. In payments on loan guarantees, funds go to U.S. banks, not to Poland. The key term here is "loan exposure", that is payments due from Poland to U.S. Banks.

There is loan exposure of $308.7 million in fiscal year 1982, $378.1 million in fiscal year 1983 and $235.4 million in fiscal year 1984. CCC has already paid $61 million in fiscal year 1981 and $97.8 million in fiscal year 1982.

	Millions
Loan guarantees	$1,081.0
Direct credit	578.1
Total CCC commitment	1,659.1

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following items be printed in the RECORD: an article from the New York Times dated February 1, 1982, entitled, "U.S. Will Repay $71 Million Due On Poland Debt"; an editorial from the Washington Post by Dan Morgan entitled, "U.S. Tells Its Banks Some Polish Debts Will Be Paid"; an excellent editorial from the Wall Street Journal of February 5, 1982, entitled, "The Burns Cable," and, finally, an article from the Wall Street Journal of Friday, January 8, 1982, entitled, "The Issue In Poland."

In that connection, Mr. President, I urge Senators who have not read the editorial from the Wall Street Journal dated February 5 to read it carefully.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. WILL REPAY $71 MILLION DUE ON POLAND DEBT

(By Edward Cowan)

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31.—The Administration has decided to repay $71 million that Poland owes to American banks. But the Government, which had guaranteed the loans, did not require the banks to declare Poland in default.

Unless rescinded, the decision puts in place a policy that would permit the Administration to repay, also without any formal declaration of default by the banks involved, $396.5 million of guaranteed debt that Poland is obligated to repay by the end of this year.

The money is part of $1.6 billion in loans to Poland that the Agriculture Department made or guaranteed to finance grain exports from this country.

The decision, which was reached last week, is an apparent concession to the worldwide financial disruption that would be triggered by a formal default of Polish debt to the West. The decision could rekindle a debate that flared in Washington, after the military takeover in Poland, about the best way for the United States to put pressure on Warsaw and Moscow.

In January alone, according to Government officials who asked not to be identified, Poland was scheduled—and failed—to pay $71.3 million of principal and interest under guaranteed loans. The schedule for the next few months, according to an Agriculture Department official, is for $52.9 million of such debt to fall due in February, $51.3 million in March and $31.7 million in April.

That Washington must satisfy the banks' claims under terms of the loan guarantees has never been in dispute, officials pointed out. The only question, they said, was whether an extraordinary procedure could be devised that would allow for repayment without having the banks formally declare the loans to be in default.

This was done when the Agriculture Department adopted an emergency regulation last week to permit such repayment. It did so without public notice, an official said, because notice was not required.

The banks with the loans were identified by a banker as Citibank, Chase Manhattan Bank, Morgan Guaranty Bank, Chemical Bank and Marine Midland Bank, all of New York City; Bank of America in San Francisco, the First National Bank of Chicago, the First Wisconsin National Bank and the Girard Bank of Philadelphia.

TIMING OF ACTION UNCLEAR

The banks were notified of the repayment decision Friday, according to people familiar with the developments, although no funds have yet been transferred to their accounts. It was not immediately clear when the transfer would actually take place.

The decision to avoid a formal declaration of default was reached in interagency meetings for sub-Cabinet officials in the last two weeks under the leadership of the National Security Council. Initially the debate was intense, officials said, with the State Department and Treasury Department against default and Fred C. Ikle, the Under Secretary of Defense for policy, in favor of it.

A question debated in the interagency group was whether default would increase pressure on the Soviet Union to bail out Poland and possibly other Eastern European countries to avoid a breakdown of their trade with the West.

But by the week's end, one official said, "virtually everyone in the executive branch now agrees that this"—avoiding default—"is the better way." Mr. Ikle, regarded as one of the "hard-line" members of the Administration, refused to comment.

KEEPING AN EYE ON TRADE

Members of the State-Treasury group argued that a declaration of default would achieve no practical result and might create a situation in which Poland made payments to European banks but not to American creditors. Some officials also said default risked disrupting East-West trade. This is "something our European allies want to avoid," one official said.

Washington officials and New York bankers said the main reasons for the decision were the following:

A declaration of default would foreclose any further efforts to persuade Poland to pay interest or principal. "Once you declare a default as such, there's no reason for them to pay any money," a Treasury official said.

One or more of the nine American banks holding the guaranteed loans wanted to avoid formal default, while exercising their guarantees, because they would then be free to try to collect the unguaranteed portion of interest owed to them.

Formal default could trigger "cross-default" clauses in West Germany bank loans to Poland, an event that might force the Bonn Government to make good on some $2 billion of outstanding guarantees. However, a New York banker said he thought such wholesale triggering was unlikely.

Default would suspend Poland's application to join the International Monetary Fund. Some officials feel that bringing Poland into the I.M.F. is desirable because it would draw the country closer to the West and also require Poland to disclose more about its economy and finances.

HOW PROCEDURE WORKS

Under the usual procedure for collecting on overdue guaranteed loans, a New York banker explained, the bank formally notifies the Commodity Credit Corporation that it wants the corporation to buy the loan. "That official notification is called notice of default," said the banker.

The emergency regulation lets the corporation offer to buy up the guarantee, officials said, at the same cost but without a notice of default.

Richard N. Perle, the Defense Department's assistant secretary for international security policy, said the United States itself, as lender and guarantor, retained the option of declaring Poland in default. "I don't think anyone can predict accurately the consequences." he said.

"It's just not in anyone's interest for a default to be declared," argued a New York banker. "It has no practical effect whatsoever. It will temporarily suspend Polish commerce worldwide for a certain period of time because ships and aircraft will be tied up and bank balances will be put on hold."

He was referring to the seizure of assets that creditors can make under default procedures in an attempt to recoup. Litigation usually results.

WASHINGTON VIEWPOINTS

The banker continued, "If you were dealing with an entity that had large amounts of assets you could get your hands on it might make sense to declare default." But Poland's identifiable assets are worth far less than its indebtedness, he said.

The so-called hard-line view in Washington is that default, by disrupting Polish trade and possibly the trade of Rumania and Hungary as well, would force the Soviet Union to pay Polish obligations in order to restore Warsaw's access to foreign suppliers.

The view of the State and Treasury Departments was that, without default, the banks and the United States Government could continue to put pressure on Warsaw to meet its obligations but that a declaration of default would amount to Washington's throwing up its hands and admitting it had no hope of being paid. Therefore, said one official, "keeping the pressure on this way is the real hard line."

U.S. TELLS ITS BANKS SOME POLISH DEBTS WILL BE PAID

(By Dan Morgan)

Under a procedure aimed at preventing a chain reaction of international financial defaults, the Reagan administration has informed U.S. banks that it will pay back some of their loans to Poland until the hard-pressed East European country can resume redeeming its debts.

A policy adopted last week—after heated debate in an interagency working group—authorizes the Agriculture Department's Commodity Credit Corporation to pay the banks the delinquent loan principal and some of the interest as it comes due over the next few months.

The loans were guaranteed by the CCC during the last three years so that Poland could purchase wheat, feed grains, soybeans and other farm commodities here with the aid of private credit.

There was never any doubt that the U.S. government had a legal obligation to cover these loans if Poland failed to pay. However, administration officials favoring a tougher stance in the Polish crisis have argued that the banks should formally announce that Poland was in default and attempt to seize assets, such as ships, before the government honored its guarantee.

Considerable sums of money are at stake in the guaranteed loan program. In January, Poland failed to pay the U.S. banks $71 million in principal and interest. For fiscal 1982, the total exposure on guaranteed loans comes to $308 million, and in the next two fiscal years, the total owed to the banks and guaranteed by the CCC comes to $613 million.

Government sources said yesterday bankers were concerned that their claims to the CCC against Poland's unpaid loans could be taken by other banks as a formal announcement that Poland was in default on its international obligations. This, in turn, could trigger a chain reaction by some 500 banks to which Poland owes money here and abroad.

To reduce the default risks, the sources said, the government gave the banks two options, both involving the CCC's picking up the Polish obligations as they came through. One option is for the CCC to cover the loan principal and 6 percent of the interest. The other option calls for the CCC to pay only the principal owed and to receive interest out of a common "pot" of Polish payments that would go to repay the banks and the U.S. government.

The New York Times, in a news report and in a column by William Safire, reported that the procedure for handling the unpaid loans involved drafting an "emergency regulation."

Safire blamed a "craven State Department" for accepting a recommendation by Deputy Secretary of Agriculture Richard E. Lyng that the bank guarantees be honored without forcing Poland into default. The Safire column, under the headline "Payoff for Repression," referred to "hardliners" who feel the administration has failed to back up its tough public statements against military rule in Poland with deeds.

Those in the administration who oppose throwing Poland into default argue that such a move would be counterproductive. They say it would provide the Soviet Union and Poland with an excuse to ignore its financial obligations to the West, and would sacrifice a major piece of leverage.

One New York City banker yesterday objected to suggestions that the government was rescuing the banks from the consequences of a default.

"The governments [in the West] have a heavy responsibility for this whole mess," he said. He said that U.S. government loans and loan guarantees to Poland have risen much faster in the last 18 months than private banking loans. "If the government is not willing to declare a default on its loans and to go out after the Poles, why should they send the banks out to do it?"

U.S. officials acknowledged that Poland's failure to pay its debts had created an unprecedented problem at the CCC. Several years ago Sudan defaulted on a loan repayment to CCC, but the amount was only $9 million, sources said.

THE BURNS CABLE

One of the key issues in the debate over whether the Reagan administration ought to declare Poland formally in default on its debts to the U.S. government is whether such an action would cause a crisis in the Western banking system. Nearly everyone agrees that U.S. banks could easily ride out such a shock, as about 60 American banks hold a scant $1.2 billion, or so, in Polish paper. But the State Department has been arguing the U.S. should continue to subsidize credit to Poland because to get tough and declare a default would cause a crisis in West Germany, whose banks hold the biggest exposure.

Now, however, the State Department has received a confidential cable from the U.S. envoy in Bonn, Arthur Burns, that makes us wonder. Mr. Burns, lately of the Fed and now on the spot where any financial crisis would start, sent his cable Jan. 29. In essence he makes three points: First, most of the effects of a Polish default will happen with or without a default. Second, the financial ramifications of default would be easier for the Western banking system to swallow if it were spread over several years, avoiding official default now but presumably requiring banks to establish reserves to cover their Polish losses. And third, that if default did happen now and make the banks swallow their losses in a gulp, the problems would still be manageable.

The Burns cable doesn't suggest there won't be serious consequences. But he says the more serious secondary effects of the Polish financial crisis are probably going to be felt even if a formal default isn't declared. He reports the Polish experience will make international banks a lot more cautious in lending to the Soviet bloc, which in turn will cause the Soviet bloc to cut back on imports from the West. Without a lot of new Western credit flowing in, other Soviet bloc countries could run into financial trouble. This would mean the German government could be forced to help its banks save some subsidiaries from going bust.

Too, with or without a declaration of default, the Polish experience will make international banks increasingly reluctant to make new loans to Third World countries with weak balance of payments positions, Mr. Burns says. And this, too, could have repercusions on Western banks of the sort that Poland might have more directly. So Mr. Burns says he's been telling German businessmen and newspapermen that Western bankers have awakened to the fact that their lending to socialist countries wasn't too bright and that they have to proceed more cautiously, while German businessmen will have to turn to Western markets.

What strikes us about the Burns cable—in the context of all the shrill doomsaying we've been hearing from the State Department—is the absence of any suggestion that getting tough would bring down the Western financial system. From the narrow financial standpoint, Mr. Burns would of course prefer to avoid sudden default and spread the losses over time. But there is far from anything that sounds like a prediction of catastrophe if this is not done.

Even from the financial perspective, Mr. Burns' judgment call depends crucially on his estimate that the Western banks have already learned their lesson. We wish we were sure. For one thing, banking regulators have not yet instructed the banks to start reserving against Polish loans. New credits are rolling forward in the pipeline deal. The Communists may well be right in their calculation that six months from now everyone will be back at the same bazaar stalls.

More fundamentally, though, the reasons for default transcend mere commercial considerations. The Soviet system does not disturb us because it cannot pay its bills. The Soviet system disturbs us because it has devoted its economy primarily to a military buildup that threatens our national security. Because of inherent inefficiency and the demands of its military sector, that economy is now staggering. Its dependence on the West is epitomized in the Polish debt, and the effects of default in inhibiting further credits and trade would be a punishing blow at its most vulnerable point.

More broadly, default would make clear the message that we will no longer finance a military machine that threatens our own well-being. It would prove that we are not without means to exert in this struggle, nor without the will to do so. If we let the opportunity slip by, we will only confirm the commissars' estimate that they have little to fear from the West, that there is no reason to slow their military buildup or moderate their aggressive foreign policy. And the confirmation would come with double force from a President elected with a mandate to restore some spine to our position in the world.

THE ISSUE IN POLAND

Yesterday our Seth Lipsky disclosed documents showing that in the wake of the Polish crackdown, the State Department's first instinct was to urge the banks to go easy in their negotiations on debt rescheduling. While State's economic wizards later thought better of such lunacy, it remains clear that no one in charge has picked up a clue that in Poland the debts are the issue.

We do not mean to denigrate the human rights implications of the Polish tragedy, nor the political lesson of yet another demonstration of the inability of communism to either tolerate or totally suppress freedom and diversity. But from the standpoint of U.S. national interests, the Polish economic crisis and its impact on Western debts has an even more portentous aspect. It is the first eruption of an issue transcending Poland and going to the heart of Soviet-American relations. To put the issue in its most dramatic form, it is this: Are we going to continue to allow and even encourage Western banks to finance the Soviet military machine?

How does this come about? For starters, it is useful to think of Poland the way Leonid Brezhnev thinks of Poland—and indeed all other members of Comecon—as a Soviet vassal state. As Mr. Nagorski reveals elsewhere on this page today, the Soviet Union in 1976 created a "transferrable ruble" to, in effect, obtain a highly favorable exchange rate from its Comecon partners and thus buy manufactured goods cheaply. To provide these goods, the satellites were encouraged to borrow heavily in the West to buy machinery, raw materials and semifinished manufactures. Western bankers and businessmen were thrilled with the new "vitality" in the East, an illusion that caused them to allow the hard currency debts of the East Europeans to rise out of all proportion to their ability to repay (see tables).

Indeed, with the breakdown of the Comecon credit pipeline and another big failure down on the collective farms, the Soviet Union has had to go directly to the West for money. The Bank for International Settlements estimates that the Soviets borrowed over $15 billion in hard currency last year. Reports from Europe yesterday suggest this borrowing is continuing (see page 2 of the Journal). And Soviet gold sales in the West more than tripled to 250 metric tons in 1981, according to London market estimates.

Despite all these circumstances, Western politicians are in their usual dither, insisting that there is nothing much they can do about the Russians' ham-fisted crackdown on the Polish workers. Quite clearly there is a great deal to do, and it is in the interest of the West to do it.

Ironically, the simplest thing the U.S. government could do would be to ask the banks to face the real risks of these loans. A significant, modest and entirely justified step would be for the Comptroller of the Currency to suggest banks take a 50% write-down on loans to Poland, and perhaps Hungary and East Germany. Bank regulatory officials in other Western countries could be encouraged to take parallel action. This would immediately raise the cost of credit to the whole Soviet bloc.

In simplest terms, the Soviet Union exploited its Comecon partners as a conduit to obtain Western goods on the cuff. As the Wharton tables show, Soviet hard currency debt has itself expanded sharply and is expected to rise further in the years ahead, but it is not yet nearly as far out of line with any prudent measure of repayment ability as the debts of Poland, Hungary and East Germany. The Russians got the TV sets and Wartburgs and the Poles, East Germans and Hungarians received the bills.

Debt Service ratio is the ratio of debt service (interest plus repayments) to sum of hard currency export balance and net balance in invisibles.

The Soviets got by with this by literally holding guns to the heads of satellite party leaders; Soviet troops and tanks ring Prague and Budapest, heavily occupy East Germany and surround Poland. What the Russians didn't foresee was that East European workers, first of all the Poles, would grow tired of having the fruits of their labors purloined. Without doubt, the absence of goods to buy with zlotys contributed to the Polish uprising.

The Soviet exploitation of Western credit markets and East European workers has had the primary purpose of enabling the Soviets to build and maintain a vast military establishment. The primary role of that establishment is to intimidate the Western European suppliers of goods and credit and absolutely control the Eastern European suppliers of labor. To this end the Soviets spend some 15 percent of their total GNP for military purposes, more than twice the percentage for the U.S. They have some 3.7 million troops in uniform, 3,300 combat aircraft, 55,000 tanks and a grand array of other lethal equipment. The officers of this force are part of the Soviet elite, highly pampered in a society where ordinary people suffer severe deprivation.

In short, the economies of Eastern Europe are organized to support the economy of the Soviet Union, and the economy of the Soviet Union is organized to support its military machine. Into this process the Western banks have pumped some $60 billion in the last decade. If the forecasts by Wharton Econometrics prove true, they will pump almost this amount again into the same process over the years of the Reagan administration.

The credit-worthiness of the Soviet Union itself is endangered by the Comecon debts, for its own economy is dependent on theirs in many ways. If it undertakes to provide the umbrella the banks have hoped for, its own resources will be stretched. Wharton Econometrics has not calculated a debt service ratio for the bloc as a whole; an analyst there captures the attitude of the banks by saying they would find each a figure "meaningless." But the OECD, which uses a more stringent debt-ratio calculation, puts the bloc at 0.4, including the Soviet Union. Some umbrella.

Beyond that, there is the definite risk that over the next few years the Soviet workforce itself will go Polish. The Soviet Union's resources are becoming ever more strained. Its inefficient use of manpower, a product of central planning and regimentation, coupled with a low birth rate, has severely stretched the manpower supply. Productivity and morale are low, owing in part to the fact that Soviet workers fare no better than the Poles at the hands of the Communist elite. Alcoholism is epidemic. The Red Army's inability to subdue Afghanistan is requiring larger infusions of troops.

In this lies the West's great foreign policy opportunity. The future of the Soviet economic system depends on access to the Western banking system. Instead of encouraging the banks to roll over debt in the wake of Poland, the government ought to be making clear that this access depends on a modicum of Soviet good behavior. By any realistic risk assessment, indeed, it is military spending and repression of Eastern Europe that call its credit standing into doubt. To price the Soviets out of the credit markets, what the government chiefly has to do is bring the lenders face to face with economic reality.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYAKAWA). The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York and the Senator from Wisconsin both have reputations of upholding freedom and resisting tyranny. I am sure it is in that spirit that they have offered this amendment, an amendment for the spirit.

I am, however, constrained to oppose the amendment.

I know that they feel, or at least I assume they feel, that this will in some way increase the pressure on the military government in Poland and, in consequence, on the Government of the Soviet Union. But I think we ought to explore that assumption for just a minute.

As a matter of fact, the United States holds a relatively small share of the Polish debt. Our allies in Europe hold a much larger share. If we are talking about being tough, it is really going to be tough on our allies if there is, in fact, a default in the Polish debts.

Those Members who had the opportunity to meet with the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, Helmut Schmidt, may recall his discussion of the Polish debt question. You may remember that he described the debt as being held by private banks, at least the German part held by private banks in Germany, but guaranteed by the Federal Republic. So if there is a general default, it will be the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany which will bear the cost.

So if we are being tough, we are being tough on our friends.

I am afraid that if that were to be the case the German Government and the German people would find that, to say the least, not a friendly act, increasing their burdens at a time when they, like the rest of the world, are suffering economic problems.

I think it would do nothing to increase the solidarity of the Western alliance. It would, in fact, I think, be taken as a step that would strike a blow at the unity of the Western alliance at the very time when we need to be more unified than we have ever been at any time in the last generation.

That would not result in being tough on the Soviet Union. That would have the ironic effect, I am afraid, of being a boon to the Soviet Union by striking a blow at the NATO alliance more devastating than any blow that the Soviet Union itself could strike. It would be an irony, indeed, if Poland were the cause of more trouble for the West than the Soviet Union.

One of the things that concerns me about this proposal is that it is a unilateral action. It is a unilateral action but it is an action which affects many countries. Of course, one of the principal things that we have been urging upon our allies is to act cooperatively, that we should act with coordination, that we should act in conjunction with each other after consultation. For us to adopt this amendment this afternoon would violate everyone of these precepts.

Mr. PERCY. Will the Senator yield for a brief comment?

Mr. MATHIAS. I am happy to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. PERCY. I wish to commend my distinguished colleague because he is the chairman of the subcommittee dealing with international economic issues. What he has said has been absolutely confirmed by three commissioners of the EEC who just happened to be here meeting with the Foreign Relations Committee this morning. They would look upon this as an utter disaster. As the distinguished Senator has so aptly said, in a sense we have the smallest end of this. The largest end of it, by all odds, is with the European banks and the European governments. As George Ball, the former Under Secretary of State and now a consultant adviser to Lehman Bros., and Kuhn, Loeb, investment bankers in New York, stated, we are the junior partner in this.

As he said in an article he wrote for the Washington Post dated Sunday, February 7, "Default would wreck the Western Alliance:"

> No useful purpose could be served by measures which would further grind down the Poles.

We would be blamed for everything. As we well know, right now there is a possibility in Poland that the military junta, or the Government there under martial law, may well take the steps that would force farmers to give up their grain. They are talking now about rationing bread in Poland. Things are getting much worse.

Instead of the Soviet Union being the cause of this kind of lack of productivity, lack of incentive, a system that is not working, suddenly, if we pulled the plug, declared them in default, we would be blamed as far as starvation and hunger possibly coming to Poland this winter. We would be bailing out the Soviet Union. We would be looking as though we had no understanding of the consequences of what we are doing.

This amendment is vigorously opposed by the Secretary of State and by the entire Reagan administration. The entire National Security Council, with great deliberation, as I understand it, unanimously came to a decision that we would not force Poland into default. That can always be done at some subsequent time if it is deemed necessary and desirable at that time.

This is a momentous decision for the U.S. Government to make and for us to be making a decision in haste at this time, without forethought, without recognizing the consequences, I think would be a disaster.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full content of George W. Ball's article, "Default Would Wreck the Western Alliance," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 7, 1982]

DEFAULT WOULD WRECK THE WESTERN ALLIANCE

(By George W. Ball)

How should the Reagan administration react to growing internal pressures for the United States to declare Poland's debts in default?

Our country has so long regarded itself as the leader of the Western Alliance that many of us take for granted the commanding authority of our official pronouncements and reactions; yet, on any principle of equity, the parties with the most to lose should have the largest vote in shaping a concerted Western response. In respect to the Polish debt issue, America is a junior partner, since the main burden of a declared default would fall on our European allies. Poland owes four nations of Western Europe—West Germany, France, the United Kingdom and Austria—official and private debts amounting to $10.6 billion; the comparable figure for the United States is $3 billion. Even more pertinent, commercial banks of those four countries hold Polish debt unguaranteed by governments amounting to $5.5 billion as compared with $1.3 billion held by American banks.

Thus U.S. banks could easily absorb a Polish default but European banks, already suffering from severe depression, could incur heavy losses. The non-guaranteed Polish debt exposure of the big German trade union Bank fur Gemeinwirtschaft amounts to 40 percent of its total net worth, while Germany's Commerzbank (one of the "big three") is exposed to the extent of 24 percent of its net worth. Austria would be even more critically shaken by a declared default since its banks and government hold 6 percent of Poland's total debt to the West.

But in the view of some Americans, Poland's current credit plight is merely the result of the inordinate greed of our Western allies and their dangerously soft line toward the Soviet bloc. "Why," they ask in the songwriter's plaintive words, "can't the others be like us?" Such parochial self-righteousness, however, ignores distinctions of both geography and history. It overlooks the fact that Poland is still in spirit and tradition a Western country; to French and Germans and even British, it is still part of Europe. The Poles and their Comecon neighbors remain Europeans even though encaged by an Iron Curtain. Over the centuries the flow of goods and capital between Eastern and Western Europe has been a good part of the continent's economic life, and, especially during the period of detente, habit, tradition and compassion triumphed over artificial, brutally enforced, political barriers.

Thus Western Europeans would bitterly resent any attempt by the United States to destroy their trade with the East, which has been integrally built into their economic life, while the West Germans would be deeply grieved by any threat to the arrangements they have painfully developed for ameliorating the hardship of divided families in a divided country. Not only would they refuse to join in any American-sponsored economic quarantine, but they could never forgive us should we—in pursuit of an ideological objective they regard as self-defeating—precipitate a banking crisis in the soggy economic climate they already blame on America's monetary policies. They would see such a destructive enterprise as final confirmation of their already dark suspicions that we ethnocentric Americans have become ever eager to strike a righteous pose at Europe's expense.

The Reagan administration narrowly avoided falling into the trap of its own sanctimony when it recently decided that American banks should not be required to declare a default on the Polish debt in order to receive reimbursement from the Commodity Credit Corporation on its guarantee. But that decision was, as the Duke of Wellington said of Waterloo, "a close-run thing" and, in this case, far from definitive. Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger and his cohorts are now threatening to force a reconsideration. They seem oblivious to the fact that an American unilateral action to declare a default would go far to wreck the alliance; nor do they seem to care that it would constitute a cruel slap at the already beleaguered Polish people for whom the resultant drying up of credits (including normal trade credits) would mean near-starvation during the bleakly cold Polish winter.

Even if the desperate Polish situation can be resolved without invoking the machinery of default, that does not mean that the Soviets and their satellites will be exempt from financial strain. The Comecon nations are all beginning to suffer from the slowdown in Polish productivity and the production shortfalls of Polish industry and agriculture, while Poland's economic troubles are curtailing Western credits to the whole Comecon bloc.

The total Soviet financial system is thus already under pressure. The U.S.S.R. suffered a $6 billion current account deficit last year, and its satellites will probably incur an additional $6 billion or $7 billion deficit with Western Europe this year; they are hoping to restore their hard currency reserves largely by the shipment of gas through the projected pipeline that the Reagan administration is now frantically trying to block. The Soviets have been drawing down deposits in Western banks and selling gold. They are likely to react to any further financial pressure primarily by impoverishing the Polish people.

The only issues so far seriously discussed are how to handle the carrying charges on Poland's debt for 1981 and 1982. But, as the experts well know, a more difficult problem is our attitude toward new credits (amounting to $4 billion to $6 billion during 1982) required to support economic life at anything like tolerable levels and permit the rebuilding of the Polish economy.

Its decision on that issue will critically test the administration's fundamental strategy for dealing with the Soviet Union, and it is well that the issue be sharply drawn. On one side will be those who would continue the general line of policy we have pursued ever since the early thawing of the Cold War a decade ago. In general, we have favored measures that would weaken the Kremlin's hold over Eastern Europe and draw its imprisoned peoples more tightly into the West. But now we are hearing the angry voices of the hard-line conservatives (the neo-isolationists) arguing instead for a reversion to the most primitive strategy of the Cold War—that we insulate the Soviet power system, strengthen its prison walls and seal off both oppressor and victims hermetically.

The central thesis of this group is that we should use the Polish debts to punish the wicked Soviets. Felix Rohatyn has lent his support by advocating that we declare "Poland bankrupt" and thus "put the burden of the Polish economy squarely on the Soviet Union," and, for reasons that pass all understanding, even Weinberger seems to have joined the clamorous mob.

One of the principal hard-line arguments is that a Soviet government short of capital might have to curtail its military expenditures, but that is pure speculation. The more likely Soviet reaction would be to starve its own people while strengthening the political clout of a military sector already gaining alarming influence.

But that logic escapes the most fanatical and vociferous hard-liners who are eager for confrontation—tending to confuse vindictiveness with policy and to derive their most exquisite pleasure from putting an indiscriminate thumb in the Soviet eye. To them the East-West struggle is a religious war. Some are even bemused by the fantasy that harassing the Kremlin will contribute to the dissolution of a Soviet Empire that, they wishfully argue, is already in an advanced state of decay. When our friends across the Atlantic disdain such a crusade, the hard-line conservatives respond: "So much the better; America can act more freely if we need no longer have to compromise with effete allies." That is a central tenet of the isolationist credo.

Luckily for our republic and the peace of the world, the great bulk of Americans are not ideologues; they are practical men and women who see little virtue in hectoring the Soviets just for sport. They do not wish to increase Polish suffering (one should not kick one's friends when they are down even for ideological reasons) nor do they want our country to be isolated or our European friends left alone to make their own separate accommodations with Moscow. Finally, they have no desire to increase the polarization of a world already at odds with itself.

So one can still hope that, once they are informed of the facts and their implications, they will recognize that we can gain nothing by helping to precipitate a world financial stringency that would blight both West and East, and that no useful purpose could be served by measures that would only further grind down the Poles. Not only would such measures be out of character for America and imprison Poland more hopelessly in the suffocating Soviet system; they would also provide the Soviets with a powerful propaganda weapon. "The greedy Western capitalists," so the Kremlin would tell the Poles, "are doing what they always do; using usury to starve you. Under their corrupt system, they care only for money." To a people suffering bitter hardship during an icy Polish winter, what could be more persuasive?

But if we are to avoid using Comecon's capital plight in a way that would imcrease the forced unity of the Soviet bloc, could we not still use it to gain help for the Poles? Assuming that we and our Western allies could agree on a negotiating strategy, should we not delicately undertake some quiet exchanges both with the Jaruzelski regime and with Moscow, presumably through an Eastern European intermediary? The Western nations could indicate their willingness to provide continuing limited help to assist Poland's extrication from its financial predicament in return for a visible Soviet contribution to the Polish people as well as visible measures to ameliorate repression and permit the Poles greater individual freedom. Quite diplomacy is a hard discipline for a public such as ours, but it is far better than bluster and meaningless public threats.

Mr. PERCY. I shall certainly support any action proposed tonight by my distinguished colleague. I thank him for yielding.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank my colleague. I agree the dangers he has pointed out do exist.

Further referring to the conversation with Helmut Schmidt, I recall that he said, in connection with this Polish debt question, that we could manage ourselves into a world financial crisis, into a worldwide depression, because of the rupple effect of this kind of problem. I simply want to say that I do not think there is any guarantee that a declaration of default as far as the Polish debt would not set off the same kind of crisis atmosphere that happens in my small town when somebody goes broke. One small creditor can rock the boat and then they all rush in, each one hoping to get his while there is still something left. We could have the same kind of mad rush of creditors here, with, really, incalculable results.

So, Mr. President, notwithstanding, I think, the laudable purpose with which I am sure the amendment has been offered by both of its sponsors, I am constrained to oppose it and I hope the Senate will defeat it.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I know the hour is late, but I do wish to respond to my dear friend, the senior Senator from Maryland.

In the view of the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) and in my own view, what we are about here is obeying our own laws. We believe that the Administrative Procedure Act requires that any change in our agencies' regulations is done only after public notice and is published in the Federal Register. The new procedures regarding the Governments' payment of Polish debts were not.

The amendment I am about to send forward nevertheless gives the President of the United States the opportunity to make policy decisions and implement them, if he will simply explain to Congress that they are necessary decisions and will serve the interests of national security. This amendment does not bind a President unduly. Moreover, it instructs him on our view of the law and of the decision he has taken with respect to Poland's debt. The latter is, as I have said today, a question of the honor of the United States.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Wisconsin has suggested changes in the amendment that the junior Senator from Wisconsin and I have at the desk. The modifications he has suggested would confine this matter solely to loans or credits extended to Poland so that there would be no jeopardy to American farmers who are involved in the credit system.

I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to modify my amendment in this matter.

Mr. MATHIAS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator from New York, is there a cross-default provision in the Polish debt situation? In other words, does a default of any part of the debt bring about a default in the entire debt, wherever owed?

Mr. President, I think that has a bearing on this amendment and on the effectiveness of the amendment, and I think that is a serious question.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I should have to say in all candor that I am not aware of a formal such arrangement. I am aware that many loan agreements include default on another loan as a condition of default, and that this practice is sometimes referred to as "cross-default." The Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) referred to tank provisions in some of these debts. But these are domestic, U.S. affairs. These are U.S. bankers, 10 banks and 2 export corporations.

Mr. MATHIAS. But if, as I believe may be the case, there is a cross-default provision—perhaps the senior Senator from Wisconsin could enlighten us on that, since he is the author of this amendment—then it is not an internal U.S. affair.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I would like to respond to the Senator's question. There is a cross-default provision. It is not mandatory; it is discretionary. In other words, it may be exercised if, in the mind of the entity making the decision, it is necessary.

I should like to have the floor for one more moment. I should like to respond to statements by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Illinois that somehow this action is coming all at once, and is a surprise.

It ought not to be. All we are doing here is essentially what we and our allies agreed we would do last April when we rescheduled the debt. We said, and all of our allies agreed, that if so-called exceptional circumstances occurred, these debts would be declared in default. So we have two legal questions. One is whether CCC money can be used without default being officially declared. The other question is what about the so-called tank clause agreed to in April? We agreed with our allies, so they ought not to be surprised. They agreed that if exceptional circumstances occurred, default would be declared.

We really have two wrongs here. First, we are not doing what we said in April we would do. Second, we are bailing out the banks in a way that could constitute a questionable use of CCC funds. It should not be a surprise. Our allies agreed with us in April that this should be done.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, further reserving the right to object, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations seems to be temporarily absent from the floor. I think this amendment goes to such a critical question, because it goes to the very nature of the action we are about to take, whether it is in fact an internal domestic question or whether it is an international question which will have a severe impact on the Atlantic alliance. Therefore, with no prejudice to further offering the amendment, I would be constrained to object to it at this moment, just until we have long enough to discuss it with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATHIAS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I do not want to keep the Senate. I know everyone wants to vote. I am not here to raise a budgetary issue. I really am having a little difficulty understanding what this is all about. I direct my question to Senator MATHIAS, but if any of the others who are here would like to answer it, I would be most appreciative.

Mr. MATHIAS. I am not sure the Senator should direct it to me. I just wandered on the floor a few minutes ago. The authors of the amendment, I am sure, know much more about it than I do.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am not going to ask only about the amendment, I would like to understand what is going on. We have a CCC program. Today, we are going to increase budget authority so we can lend some more money, because that program is going to run out of money.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. $5 billion, sir, not just some more money.

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes; $5 billion.

What we ought to understand is how does the issue of Poland and paying banks for Poland's loans arise?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I——

Mr. DOMENICI. Let me just ask this: How can we use CCC money to pay banks that are owed money when we are merely a guarantor and there is no default?

I am not saying we cannot pay the banks without declaring default, if we want to do it. I wonder if that is what the CCC says now. It would surprise me if it did. If we are guarantors, a guarantor does not pay off unless there is a default.

I am not sure we do not have a bigger issue, and we ought not to just close our eyes, which we may do tonight.

But I think we should all understand why that is happening. Can somebody answer? How do we pay off guarantees before there is a default? If we do it here, can we do it with the whole CCC fund all over the world with all these loans being made?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator from Wisconsin is knowledgeable in the extreme in this matter and earlier in the debate introduced into the RECORD a legal brief which stated that in fact the recent action of the CCC may well be illegal but perhaps the Senator might wish to speak to this himself.

Mr. KASTEN. The question of the Senator from New Mexico is absolutely to the point. We are, without declaring a default, buying up essentially the loans from the bank, so that rather than being loans from the bank, they become loans from the U.S. Government. That is essentially what we are doing. If we begin with this first $71 million—I have the schedule month by month by month—in the next 4 years it adds up to $876 million that they are planning month by month to pick up without ever declaring a loan in default.

We can argue the question on $71 million or we can argue the question on $171 million or we can get to $271 million, but they have a schedule right now showing that month by month they are going to pick up, without declaring these loans in default, $876 million.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I say to the Senator from New Mexico, my friend the chairman, it is the routine procedure of the CCC, that when the holder of a guaranteed loan comes in to say, "The loan is not being repaid. Therefore, I would like to have my insured loan paid to me." Routinely, the loan is declared to be in default. A probably illegal exception was made on January 29, by the administration.

Mr. DOMENICI. Let me ask these questions. That case is a pretty easy one. If one is going to vote tonight on that issue alone, it appears to me quite obvious how we should vote. We should change the law to give people authority to do this.

On the other hand, it is a serious international policy decision that we are being asked to make here, and I am not sure we should make it on an appropriations bill.

On the other hand, it seems to me that we ought to have a little more to say about whether we are going to continue this kind of thing. This is a very serious issue. There are two schools of thought about the entire Western World and its loans to the satellite nations. I understand that. Senator MOYNIHAN's friend from New York, Felix Rohatyn, who solved New York's problem, wrote an article, and he is going to help us solve this. He said he would solve it this way, as I understand it. Let them go bankrupt. Let the Soviets pick up the tab, says he. But it appears to me that we could solve it in a little different way here tonight. Why do we not put some kind of limit on this action by the CCC and say this is all you can do until we come back here, instead of forcing an international crisis over a very small amount of money?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield.

Mr. KASTEN. First of all, to answer the Senator's second question, one of the basic objections to this amendment is that it might have the effect of forcing another vote in the House of Representatives tomorrow. So, no matter what we did in terms of limitations or whatever kind of language or mechanisms or whatever, it would be objected to by some. But the Senator questioned, further, why we do not change the law to allow this kind of thing.

Mr. DOMENICI. Or not allow.

Mr. KASTEN. I would say that an up-or-down vote on this floor that would say we will allow the CCC to bail out banks in default around the world would have an unlikely chance of passing, in the sense that we would not want to change the law. The law is written the way it is because we want to at least be bailing out loans that are in default, not loans that are not.

Who is making the judgment as to whether they are in default or not, whether these loans need to be bailed out? This is a terrible procedure. The reason it ought to be dealt with now is that we are in the process of making the first of a series of bailouts. This $5 billion is coming out of the CCC fund. These are fungible funds. We have to act now.

Mr. DOMENICI. All I am suggesting is that the Senator is going to lose, and he has a good point. Perhaps the Senator is not even going to precipitate the type of issue that we have here. He might precipitate it if he will say, "OK, we are going to let you pay off these loans without declaring default this time but no more until the issue is settled by Congress."

The Senator is not going to win because we are afraid of an international crisis over a little money. But what the Senator is doing is opening the door, if we do not support him, for the CCC to go on forever paying under similar circumstances. We will be back here in a few months adding another $5 billion to CCC. That is the only reason I raised the question.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, this amendment is deserving. We should have some consistency in our policy. I agree with that. For some reason, what we are doing on one hand is stopping farm exports by stopping negotiations with Poland for grain.

On the other hand, we are asking the American taxpayer to bail out the New York bankers and bankrupt Communist dictators on a carte blanche basis.

To bust the back of the farmer by jeopardizing this bill to conduct foreign policy is not the way to thrash this issue out and get it resolved. Regardless of the merits of the amendment, the bottom line is that the CCC needs the $5 billion borrowing authority to cope with the unprecedented commodity loan demand and the deficiency estimates. The CCC should not be permitted to cease operations. The facts of life are—right or wrong; tell it as it is—the House is going home tomorrow. If we start cluttering this up with foreign policy now, we are going to jeopardize the CCC operation. So let us get on with voting on this bill, voting down these amendments, and then get this nonsense cleared up some other way.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin clarify a point for me in this debate? Is the Senator a proponent or an opponent of this amendment?

Mr. KASTEN. I am a cosponsor of this amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. Will the Senator clarify this for me: If the Commodity Credit Corporation had not bought the loans, would there have been cross defaults in other banks around the world?

Mr. KASTEN. It is at their discretion.

Mr. BRADLEY. It is at whose discretion?

Mr. KASTEN. The language in these loans includes cross-default clauses, but they are not mandatory. In other words, the individual lenders would make those decisions.

The cross-default clause will not automatically trigger. It is at the discretion of the various financial institutions and the lenders.

Mr. BRADLEY. But it is a possibility?

Mr. KASTEN. It is a possibility. I think, to answer the Senator in more complete terms, it is a distinct possibility.

One of the questions that I addressed this morning to Secretary Hormats of the State Department and Secretary Leland of the Treasury is what would be the effect if we assumed the most crossover, in other words. Would we unravel the entire financial system of the Eastern bloc countries, and could that unraveling even extend possibly to Mexico or to Brazil or to other countries? They said no, that probably would not happen.

Their position is close to the position that was expressed by our Ambassador to West Germany, Arthur Burns, and was picked up in the Wall Street Journal editorial the other day—that, yes, it would be a serious problem but that the banks could deal with it; it is manageable and it would not have this unraveling effect.

Mr. BRADLEY. Fine. Does the Senator think it is the responsibility of a public official to make sure that that does not happen, the unraveling of the international banking structure?

Mr. KASTEN. I do not believe that any of us intend this. I simply believe the experts that I talked to today. They said it would not happen. The purpose of this amendment is not to unravel the international financial institutions.

Mr. BRADLEY. I understand that.

Mr. KASTEN. The purpose of this amendment is to start to place the blame where it belongs for the financing problems that we have in Poland.

Mr. BRADLEY. My point is that if you have the possibility of the unraveling of the international financial community and you default on the $71 million loan, then what you had better have in place is a contingency plan to prevent the bankruptcy of the international financial system.

The Under Secretary of State was before the Senator's committee and so was the Secretary of State before the Finance Committee 6 months ago at which time I propounded this exact question: What is the contingency plan if there is a default in Poland?

Does the Senator know what the response was?

"We do not have a contingency plan."

I think the most important thing that can come out of this amendment is for the Senate to begin to focus on the possibility that cross-default clauses might, indeed, endanger the economic health of this country and we better have a contingency plan.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey will allow me to make a comment, I would point out that there is a clause in this modified amendment, a clause which appeared in my original proposal, which allows the President to proceed as he is doing if he will only explain to us, on a monthly basis, the manner in which the national security interest of the United States has been served by these payments during the previous month. It does serve to focus the administration's attention, which I believe is the concern of the Senator.

Mr. BRADLEY. But my suspicion is, and I say to my colleague from New York that is the reason the administration brought these loans, because they know they do not have a contingency plan and were not willing to take the chance.

My point is that thing is going to happen again and again and again.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Unless we focus their attention.

Dr. Johnson is well known for his remark that there is nothing that concentrates the mind so well as the prospect of hanging. It seems to me this might concentrate some minds.

The distinguished majority leader is on his feet.

I ask unanimous consent to modify the resolution in such a way that Mr. PROXMIRE will cosponsor it. If I cannot get unanimous consent, I prefer just to simply send the amendment to the desk as a new amendment.

Mr. MATHIAS. I do feel constrained to continue my objection at least for the time being.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I had hoped that we could finish this measure tonight. It appears we cannot.

I have no desire to preemptorily try to bring it to a conclusion with a tabling motion. Obviously there is grave concern on both sides of the issue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past 10 minutes in length so Senators may speak for not more than 2 minutes each.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object, and I shall not object to the majority leader's suggestion, but I wish to point out to the majority leader and the Senate that if this amendment were to be adopted we would not want to delay the CCC bill. By not discussing this fully and voting on it tonight we are precluded from presenting it with the possibility that we may end up by adopting it tomorrow and the House of Representatives will be out of session.

I am concerned about that, and I wish to make sure the majority leader is aware of that, that if we vote on it tonight and the House votes on it tomorrow——

Mr. BAKER. I indicated earlier that I thought the House of Representatives would be in session only pro forma. I find that I am mistaken.

The majority leader in the House of Representatives indicated they will be in session tomorrow for the transaction of business. So we can still deal with this matter.

It will be my intention to have the Senate meet at 10 a.m. to transact routine matters such as special orders and then proceed to this matter.

Mr. KASTEN. All right.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I renew my request for a period for routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Chair. There will be no further rollcall votes this evening.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, as counsellor to the President, I was involved in the deliberations that led to the decision in July 1970, to deny tax exempt status to racially discriminatory private schools. We were successful then because such a result not only represented settled public policy, but was required as well under the law. I feel certain that we will be successful again in our current efforts to reverse the unfortunate decision made by the administration on January 8. Toward that goal, I ask unanimous consent that a 1978 statement by Mr. Thomas Troyer, past chairman of the Exempt Organizations Committee of the American Bar Association Tax Section, and a letter to Attorney General Smith from Archibald Cox, chairman, of Common Cause be printed in the RECORD following my remarks. I urge my colleagues to review this material for I feel it explains clearly why I and many others feel that the authority of the Internal Revenue Service in this area is clear and has been clear for over a decade.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THOMAS A. TROYER

Mr. Chairman and Members of the panel: My name is Thomas Troyer. I am a partner in the Washington law firm of Caplin & Drysdale. I am the immediate past chairman of the Exempt Organizations Committee of the American Bar Association Tax Section. In my private law practice, I represent a good many charitable organizations, including some educational institutions.

Today, however, I underscore that I am testifying only on my individual views of the law which is the subject of this hearing. I am not testifying on behalf of any client. I am not, of course, representing my law firm. I am not speaking on behalf of the American Bar Association or the Tax Section of the American Bar Association.

OVERVIEW

As I have reviewed the controlling law on the subject of this hearing and the Internal Revenue Service's proposed Revenue Procedure, I have been led to three conclusions.

1. First, the Internal Revenue Service has a clear and compelling legal responsibility to adopt an effective administrative system to foreclose the allowance of charitable tax benefits to racially discriminatory private schools.

2. Second, given that legal responsibility, the general approach—and I emphasize the word "approach"—of the proposed Revenue Procedure is a good one.

3. Third, the Internal Revenue Service should work promptly with representatives of schools which have legitimate problems under the proposal to refine the rules and resolve the problems—as far as the governing law permits those problems to be resolved—and then the Service should proceed to adopt the Revenue Procedure in final form. It should not defer its own administration of existing law pending Congressional review of the area and possible Congressional action to change the law.

Let me take a moment or two to explain the considerations which lead to each of these three conclusions.

IRS LEGAL RESPONSIBILITY

First, it seems to me that the Internal Revenue Service has a clear and compelling legal responsibility to adopt an effective administrative mechanism to prevent the allowance of charitable tax advantages to racially discriminatory private schools.

Since the Supreme Court affirmed the Green v. Connally case in 1971, it has been a clear and firmly established principle of federal tax law that the advantages which the Internal Revenue Code establishes for charitable organizations—generally, qualification to receive deductible charitable contributions and tax exemption—do not extend to racially discriminatory private schools. That principle has been repeatedly recognized by the lower federal courts since 1971. The Supreme Court has done nothing since that time to cast any doubt on the principle. Consequently, by now there simply is no room for reasonable dispute about it. Further, while there is no comparably definitive determination on the point, what judicial authority there is uniformly supports the proposition that this principle of law does not stop at the door of the church school.

Nonetheless, despite the clarity of the tax law affirmed in the Green case, we have widespread indications that, in important areas of the law's application, it simply is not controlling people's actions—that private schools which do, in fact, have racially discriminatory policies are, year after year after year, receiving the very real and important financial tax advantages which the Supreme Court held that they are not entitled to. From 20 to 30 individual schools have specifically been held by courts to have racially discriminatory policies—but are still, to this day, receiving all of the tax advantages provided by the Internal Revenue Code for charitable organizations. The Commission on Civil Rights has several times drawn attention to particular schools, and groups of schools, that practice racial discrimination—but continue to be treated as tax qualified charitable organizations. The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, a highly respected and highly professional organization, has compiled information, alleging with considerable particularity, racially discriminatory policies by a broad range of schools around the country—all of which continue to derive the tax benefits of qualified charitable organizations. Beyond this rather considerable body of information on the racial policies of specific schools, the various courts which, over the years, have had the job of reviewing the racial policies of schools in non-tax settings have held that private schools formed or substantially expanded close to the time of the desegregation of the public schools in their community bear what the courts have come to term a "badge of doubt": that is to say, the courts have held that the racial policies of this entire class of schools are at least subject to special, searching scrutiny.

The situation, then, is one in which the major principle of law is quite clear, but in which there is evidence from a diversity of sources that the law is not being complied with. That situation has arisen because the IRS administrative system so far has granted charitable classification to schools which say that they are nondiscriminatory—without any real regard to what the schools do. In that situation, it seems to me that the Service ought to take a bit of advice from a former federal official who was around Washington in the early 1970's: it is time for the Service to watch what these people do, not what they say.

APPROACH OF REVENUE PROCEDURE

If the Service is to carry out the legal responsibility, it seems to me that the approach taken by the proposed Revenue Procedure is a good one. In so far as possible, it sets out objective standards to be used in determining whether the racial policies of particular schools are discriminatory or not—limiting the range of discretion open to individual Revenue Agents and other administrative IRS personnel. In stating these standards, the proposal draws heavily upon the experience which the courts have developed over the years, in non-tax situations, to detect the presence of discrimination in school policies. The proposal's application of special tests to what it calls "reviewable" schools is in accord with the findings of the courts that schools in this class carry a badge of doubt. Finally, the proposal grants what seems to me a rather generous safe harbor rule for schools which actually have significant minority enrollment.

Consequently, it seems to me that, with the proposed Revenue Procedure, the IRS is on the right track to fulfilling its legal responsibility on this subject.

REVISION AND ADOPTION OF REVENUE PROCEDURE

That does not mean that the IRS has proceeded all of the way down the track and into the station yet. As comments of other speakers today have indicated, some significant room remains for redrafting, refinement, and revision of the Revenue Procedure. To the extent that these steps can be taken to accommodate the real and legitimate problems of private schools actually operating in a good faith nondiscriminatory fashion, the Service should take them.

Once that is done, however, the IRS should adopt the Revenue Procedure formally and proceed to apply it vigorously in the Service's administration of existing law. A number of the Congressional critics of the IRS proposal this morning and others have asked the Service to wait—wait until Congress has an opportunity to review the entire area and adopt new legislation to deal with it. There are some people involved here who have already been waiting—and waiting—and waiting. They are the minority children who have Constitutional and statutory rights to nondiscriminatory educational opportunities. The Supreme Court told us in 1971 that the tax advantages established by the Internal Revenue Code for charitable organizations are not to be allowed to undermine the realization of those children's rights.

Since that time, children who were barely beginning elementary school have proceeded through grade after grade and have graduated. Teenagers who were in high school have passed entirely out of the educational system, have families of their own, and are beginning to wonder what kind of educational opportunities will be available for their children.

It seems to me that we have waited long enough. We have known what the controlling law here is for a very long time. Congress has already had almost a decade to do something about that law if it does not like it—and it will have further opportunity to review it within a month. At least by now the Internal Revenue Service has sufficient experience with its present administrative system to know that, as a means of enforcing the law, it simply does not work. In light of that, the IRS has an unavoidable legal responsibility to adopt a system that does work.

COMMON CAUSE,
Washington, D.C., January 26, 1982.

Hon. WILLIAM FRENCH SMITH,
Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I write on behalf of Common Cause to protest the Administration's recent actions undermining the Internal Revenue Service policy of denying tax exempt status to private schools which discriminate on the basis of race. The Administration's approach to this issue has been legally wrong, and procedurally indefensible. No legislation is needed to validate the long-standing IRS policy, which has a solid basis in law and has been tacitly approved by Congress. Singling out this IRS policy from all other analogous interpretative rulings, and claiming that it, alone, needs specific Congressional action before it can be enforced is itself discriminatory.

Further, there appears to be no justification for the Administration's decision to grant favored tax exempt status to Bob Jones University and Goldsboro Christian School. Nothing relevant to the tax laws distinguishes these two schools from many others similarly situated—except the judicial ruling that they are not tax exempt. If the other segregated institutions are to be denied a tax exemption, the same policy should apply to Bob Jones University and the Goldsboro Christian School. The Administration's determination to grant them favored status seems to be only a device for circumventing the Judiciary by mooting a successful legal case, vacating an important lower court decision, and avoiding a Supreme Court ruling.

The Treasury Department's view that it need not deny tax exemptions to segregated schools is plainly contrary to judicial precedents. In 1971, a three-judge district court permanently enjoined the Department from granting tax exempt status to private schools in Mississippi which engage in racial discrimination. Green v. Connally, 330 F. Supp. 1150 (D.D.C. 1971) (three-judge court), aff'd. mem. sub nom. Coit v. Green, 404 U.S. 997 (1971). Although the wording of that injunction is technically limited to schools located in Mississippi, the court left no doubt that its reasoning and its declaration of law applies nationwide. Judge Leventhal, writing for the court, stated:

To obviate any possible confusion, the court is not to be misunderstood as laying down a special rule for schools located in Mississippi. The underlying principle is broader, and is applicable to schools outside Mississippi with the same or similar badge of doubt.—330 F. Supp. at 1174.

The three-judge court anticipated the danger of weakening actions by the Treasury Department. In ruling that declarative and injunctive relief were necessary despite the Department's voluntary agreement to change its policy, the court noted:

If defendants' construction were discretionary, it could be changed in the future. We think plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration of relief on an enduring, permanent basis, not on a basis that could be withdrawn with a shift in the tides of administration, or changing perceptions of sound discretion.—330 F. Supp. at 1170-71.

The Treasury Department explains its recent "change of perceptions" by referring to your advice as Attorney General that there is insufficient statutory basis in the tax code for the Treasury to continue to deny the exemptions. This advice flies in the face of precedent.

In Green v. Connally, supra, the three-judge court concluded, after extensive analysis, that denial of tax exemptions to discriminatory institutions was not only authorized, but required, by the current tax provisions. 330 F. Supp. at 1164. To do otherwise, the court said, would "frustrate" long-standing federal public policy against support for racial segregation of schools. Id. at 1164. Further, the court held that any contrary construction of the tax code—such as that now adopted by the Treasury Department—would "raise serious constitutional questions." Id. The court held that "it would be difficult indeed to establish that such support can be provided consistently with the Constitution." Id. at 1165; see also Green v. Kennedy, 309 F. Supp. 1127 (D.D.C. 1970). The Supreme Court affirmed this decision. Coit v. Green, 404 U.S. 997 (1971).

The Fourth Circuit reached precisely the same result in Bob Jones University v. United States, 639 F.2d 147 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. granted 50 U.S.L.W. 3278 (U.S. Oct. 13, 1981). The court relied heavily upon the reasoning of the Green case to conclude that the IRS acted within its statutory authority in denying tax exempt status to a racially discriminatory school. The court held that the government's interpretation of the tax code to deny such an exemption was supported by the statute's "purpose and history," and was consistent with "government policy against subsidizing racial discrimination in education, public or private." Id. at 151. It is this decision which the government now seeks to have the Supreme Court vacate as moot.

One more point is exceedingly important. Surely you will agree that under our system of government it is ultimately for the Judiciary to rule upon whether the Treasury has authority to withhold tax exempt status from a school that engages in racial discrimination. Two courts have held that it does have that authority. As a former Solicitor General of the United States I realize that there are occasions on which a responsible law officer feels that he cannot in good conscience defend a lower court decision favorable to the Government. I assume that that was your position on the merits in this case, even though it seems to me to fly in the face of reason and justice. But surely, on that assumption, the only proper course was to ask the Solicitor General to file a confession of error, stating that you believe the judgment below to be erroneous, explaining your reasoning, and submitting the issue to the Supreme Court for its decision. If no one else was willing, you could have filed such a confession of error as Attorney General. Seeking to moot the case by giving these two taxpayers preferential treatment, however well intended, is bound to appear as a deliberate effort to avoid a judicial ruling.

I submit that the suggestion of mootness should be withdrawn, and that any question concerning the correctness of that judgment should be submitted to the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Treasury Department's assertion that there is a need for congressional guidance at this time is also without foundation. The non-exemption policy implemented by the Treasury Department in 1971 was followed for eleven years by both Republican and Democratic administrations, and with the full knowledge of Congress. Particularly in light of the judicial decisions which had construed the current code to support and authorize that practice, Congress' failure to amend the statute over the past decade must be considered as expressing agreement with the Treasury Department's policy. See, e.g., Helvering v. Winmill, 305 U.S. 79, 83 (1938). Congressional action would be necessary only to change the Department's long-standing practice, not, as you suggest, to continue it. Indeed, Congress has approvingly noted the judicial decisions requiring the denial of tax exemptions to segregated schools. Both the House and Senate reports on a 1976 tax bill cite the Supreme Court affirmance of Green v. Connally, supra, and state that racial discrimination is "inconsistent" with an educational institution's tax exempt status. S. Rep. No. 94-1318, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 8 n.5 (1976); H.R. Rep. No. 94-1353, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 8 n.5 (1976).

The Internal Revenue Service, in its day-to-day administration of the tax code, makes countless determinations on the scope and application of the law, including questions of whether exempt status is justified in light of clear national policies. See, e.g., Revenue Ruling 80-278, 1980-2 C.B. 175; Revenue Ruling 80-279, 1980-2 C.B. 176; Revenue Ruling 76-204, 1976-1 C.B. 152; Revenue Ruling 75-384, 1975-2 C.B. 204. In Revenue Ruling 76-204, for example, exemption was granted on the ground that "the organization is enhancing the accomplishment of the express national policy of conserving the nation's unique natural resources." (Emphasis supplied.) In Revenue Ruling 75-384, on the other hand, exemption was denied to an organization formed to promote world peace and disarmament by nonviolent direct action including acts of civil disobedience on the ground that the organization's activities "demonstrate an illegal purpose which is inconsistent with charitable ends." (Emphasis supplied.) In addition to these recent "published" rulings, many "private letter rulings" have proceeded on a similar analysis. All of these authorities take various national policies into account in passing upon the issue of exemption.

Such decisions applying fundamental national policies are routinely made without recourse to Congress. The Treasury Department has now singled out one policy relating to the tax treatment of segregated schools and imposed upon it the unique obstacle of requiring express congressional approval. In singling out this one policy as requiring specific congressional approval, the Administration is imposing an unwarranted and perhaps unconstitutional burden on the federal government's anti-discrimination policies. In an analogous situation, the Supreme Court has held that the imposition of special burdens on those seeking governmental relief against racial discrimination is itself a violation of the Equal Protection Clause. Hunter v. Erikson, 393 U.S. 385, 391 (1969).

Thus, the Administration's actions in these cases, unless corrected, will have two distressing consequences. Despite belated protestations, it will encourage discriminatory racial policies repugnant to most Americans. It will also foster the widespread cynicism that results when the chief law officer of the United States puts himself in a position of seeming to grant special favors to two taxpayers in an effort to circumvent the rule of law.

Sincerely,

ARCHIBALD COX,
Chairman.

FEDERAL AID TO COLLEGES

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I draw the attention of the Senate to an article by Dr. Michael I. Sovern, president of Columbia University, that appeared in the February 7, New York Times magazine. In this essay, President Sovern compellingly argues the case for keeping Federal aid to colleges. President Sovern believes that it is not yet too late to reverse "the damaging cuts in student aid as well as cuts in the funding of new scientific equipment and in university research budgets." Increased support for education and research must, he writes, be given a high priority. I agree.

I found his article so insightful and so thought-provoking that I felt I simply must share it with my colleagues.

Mr. President, I now insert President Sovern's article in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times magazine, Feb. 7, 1982]

THE CASE FOR KEEPING U.S. AID TO COLLEGES

(By Michael I. Sovern)

"If you think education is expensive," goes an old college fund-raising maxim, "try ignorance." The warning is timely.

At a time when Government should be making major new investments in campus research, vital to raising national productivity, the Reagan Administration has embarked on a program of "economies" that will drastically curtail research efforts in the nation's universities, turn many of the best minds of a generation away from careers in education and research, and close the door to first-rate young people who cannot pay today's tuitions.

Obviously, those assigning us the loser's role in the international technology competition have not intended these consequences. Commenting on the entire Federal budget, David Stockman himself conceded that "we didn't think it all the way through."

It is, however, not too late to think it all the way through and reverse the damaging cuts in student aid as well as cuts in the funding of new scientific equipment and in university research budgets—measures that would actually result in "savings" of only a fraction of 1 percent of the Federal budget.

The issue is not whether the Federal Government as a whole is spending too much or too little, nor whether the supply-siders, Keynesians or monetarists, have the best of the argument. Whatever the economic faith of our elected officials, increased support for education and research must be given a high priority.

The predominance of American professors among Nobel Prize winners dramatically demonstrates the importance of our campuses in producing men and women who gave this nation the lead it once enjoyed in science and technology. But Nobel Prizes celebrate the accomplishments of yesterday, not tomorrow.

Today, at independent universities that trained most of the country's scientists and produced the lion's share of major research advances, world-renowned pioneers are working in physical facilities that are woefully out of date. Although China's scientific development fell far behind us during the Cultural Revolution, a recent group of Chinese visitors were astonished at the antiquated scientific equipment they saw on a tour of a leading Middle Western university.

Had they traveled more widely, they would have realized that this was the norm and not the exception. Not only has laboratory equipment been refined at a dizzying pace, but costs have sky-rocketed as well. A recent study by the Association of American Universities found that a $750 million investment in scientific equipment and facilities is needed over the next three years simply to sustain current activities at only 15 of the nation's research universities.

It would be hyperbolic to say that we are embarking on our own Cultural Revolution. But one can imagine, without exaggeration, a news story of Jan. 20, 1989, datelined Washington, that reads: "In her inaugural address, the President called for a multibillion-dollar crash program of Federal and private investment in America's university research base. She asserted that radical action is critical to meet the problems posed by the greatest shortage of scientists and scholars in our history. Without it, she said, we have no hope of regaining our position as tenth most productive nation in the world."

Such a news story would not be farfetched because the per capita gross national product of the United States has slipped to tenth place in the world. Our foreign trade pattern resembles that of an underdeveloped country: We export raw materials in abundance and import more manufactured goods than we sell abroad. All this cannot be isolated from the fact that over the past 15 years, Japan and West Germany have doubled their output of scientists and engineers.

Tolerance of this erosion of our ability to compete in the world runs counter both to the Reagan agenda and to a long and wise tradition. Since World War II, the Government has pursued a bipartisan policy rooted in the recognition that the nation's well-being depends on a national commitment to the quality of its universities. Federal support produced the rapid growth of graduate schools and the consequent surge to international pre-eminence of American university research. The Federal Government has recognized that scientific and technological competitions with other nations are won or lost on American campuses.

Major research universities cannot but applaud the Reagan Administration's goals of controlling inflation and promoting a sound and stable economy, but these goals are not served by cutbacks in Federal assistance to higher education. When a high-technology company is in danger of losing out to the competition, it invests more in research and development, not less. In the world economy, the United States competes for scientific leadership not only with Japan but with much of Western Europe. If this country is to meet that competition, have a sound economy and bring inflation under control, it must invest more in research and development. Past investment in American universities has been repaid many times over by massive contributions to the national strength. If there is a time to increase that investment, this is it.

When Ronald Reagan took office, there was no Federal program to deal with the decaying physical plant of the nation's universities. There was the beginning of a response to the problem of outdated equipment, but this was killed by the Office of Management and Budget. What all universities had was a respectable program for making the most of their "human capital." "Human capital," the economist Eli Ginzberg pointed out, "defined as the 'skill, dexterity and knowledge' of the population, has become the critical input that determines the rate of growth of the economy. . . ." This perspective underlies the Federal Government's provision since 1965 of nearly $20 billion in loan guarantees and interest subsidies for college and university students plus billions more in direct financial aid to students most in need. Session after session of Congress concluded that these funds would be a fruitful investment in the nation's future.

The Reagan Administration, however, is pressing a massive assault on virtually every aspect of the Federal student aid program. It did put an end to such questionable programs as subsidized loans to families that did not need them. But by proposing huge additional cuts in student aid, the Administration has shown little understanding of the critical importance of such aid to the national interest. Without a strong Federal role in assisting promising students to further their studies, the supply of students will diminish in quantity and quality. In fact, many graduate schools are facing a diminishing pool of qualified applicants.

Ironically, success in the drive against student aid would mean not only a dismantling of much of the nation's research base, but a large increase in costs to the taxpayer as well.

To understand that paradox, one must understand the financing of a college education. It actually costs about $8,000 per student for a college to run a high-quality undergraduate program. That does not include books, room, board and other living costs.

Suppose a promising Cincinnati high-school senior—call him Alex Hamilton—wants to attend an Ivy League university. The Hamilton family's income is about the national median of $21,000. Alex's younger sister is also a good student.

Many students like Alex are enrolled in independent colleges and universities today. How? First, they are often not charged what it actually costs to educate them. Endowment income and contributions meet some expenses that would otherwise be passed along as part of the tuition fee. Second, needy students can receive an additional subsidy in the form of a scholarship, for which Alex Hamilton would qualify at many schools. Third, Alex may borrow $2,500 from a bank at 9 percent interest under the Guaranteed Student Loan Program. Fourth, he would be eligible for a Federal Pell Grant of about $800. He and his parents would make up the rest—from any savings they might have and from his summer and after-school jobs.

Thus, we have a package of support provided by the college, Alex, his parents, and the Federal Government. Like millions of Americans before him—including Ronald Reagan and me—Alex is working his way through college. But times have changed: No student can earn what it costs to attend an independent college today. To ask that every student contribute something before receiving help is fair. To withhold help from those who have done all that can be expected of them is cruel and ultimately wasteful.

How much is the Federal Government actually contributing to the cost of Alex's higher education? Since he pays no interest on his loan until after graduation, the Federal share includes the interest on that $2,500 loan—say $375 per year (at 15 percent interest). That plus his Pell Grant of $800 totals $1,175 for his freshman year. The taxpayer's dollar is matched about 6 to 1 by private resources, and Alex is free to choose a college based on his ability. (As he moves to his senior year and borrows more, the Federal interest cost will rise accordingly, but it will never be more than a small fraction of his total costs.)

What the Reagan Administration proposed? First shrink the Pell Grant program. This would eliminate Alex Hamilton's eligibility. Subtract $800. Second, abolish the in-school interest subsidy. Subtract the remaining $375. There would be an apparent saving to the taxpayer of $1,175.

But there is no such saving. It still costs $8,000 to educate Alex Hamilton. Without the option of going to a private college or university—where the cost of that education is largely absorbed by private resources—students like Alex will most likely go to a public institution close to home. The tuition at a publicly supported institution is about $1,500; the remaining $6,500 comes from public funds. Thus, by increasing the number of students at public universities, the Reagan Administration will actually be saddling state taxpayers with an increased cost of $6,500 in order to save $1,175.

Furthermore, the Reagan Administration's policy toward higher education will affect a staggeringly large number of students: Most of this country's 12 million college and university students come from families with incomes of less than $30,000; the families of many earn less than $20,000.

A fundamental strength of the American system of higher education is diversity. It would be folly to upset the balance of public and private education, to limit individual choice, to segregate rich students in private universities and the poor and middle class in public ones. Yet these are the effects of the Reagan Administration's financial aid policy.

What of the effect of the Administration's proposals on graduate schools—the source of tomorrow's researchers, scholars and teachers?

If Alex Hamilton were to spend four years at an independent college, by the time he graduated he would owe $10,000—plus, under the Administration's plan, annual interest costs. Lending institutions have indicated they will not take on the burden of collecting interest from students on a periodic basis. In response, the Administration has recommended compounding the interest so Alex will owe not $10,000 on graduation, but $12,000 or more.

At that point he must decide whether to go on for a Ph.D. or try a professional school. As a graduate student he is now entitled to borrow $5,000 a year. If Alex chooses the Ph.D. route, the Administration's proposal would bring his cumulative debt after his first year to approximately $19,000. After his second year, that debt will be approaching $26,000. And he still has at least three more years before he can reasonably hope to get an assistant professorship—at a salary of less than $20,000 a year. The prospect is forbidding even with the in-school interest subsidy.

The nation's universities are producing lawyers and business-school graduates at an unprecedented rate and scientists and scholars in diminishing numbers. Traditionally, a large proportion of graduate students in the humanities have set their sights on college teaching. But with little hope of immediate employment during the current tenure bulge, many of the best scholars are switching to professional schools. In an exhaustive and disturbing study of the perils facing American graduate schools, William G. Bowen, president of Princeton University, found that in 1980 only 34 percent of all summa graduates at Harvard-Radcliffe planned immediate graduate study in the arts and sciences—compared with more than 75 percent in the mid-1960's. And who will be there to teach the next generation of scientists? Between 1970 and 1980, the number of Ph.D.'s in physics graduating from American universities dropped by almost half—from 1,740 to 985.

If the budget cutters have their way, tomorrow's little band of Ph.D's will consist of the scions of the wealthy, another handful that the best-endowed universities can afford to support, and a larger number supported by taxpayers at public colleges and universities. Though our graduate schools have had a glorious past—leading the nation in a century of unparalleled advances in research—whether they have a future depends upon the continued resistance of Congress to an unbelievably shortsighted proposal.

I believe deeply in the unquantifiable values of a university. Great universities aspire to transmit to their students the heritage of civilization; to unlock the treasures of the past; to bring fresh vision and new discipline to the growing fund of human knowledge; to enliven curiosity; to cherish the freedom to explore and express; to encourage joy in the presence of beauty and appreciation in the presence of wisdom; to discover, in the words of William Saroyan, "that which shines and is beyond corruption." It is not simply for technology that we need to know more, Lewis Thomas observes, "but for the hope of wisdom which our kind of culture must acquire for its survival."

A society that undervalues such aspirations does so at its peril. But even if one believes that a democratic society has no stake transcending economics and defense in the education of its citizens, one has to conclude that the Administration's policy toward higher education runs counter to the goals it has set for itself.

Anyone who balances the cost of fundamental laboratory research—which provides the base for such practical discoveries as antibiotics—against the soaring cost of medical care will find that, dollar for dollar, biomedical research is far and away the best buy in town. The sad irony is that today, with the explosive productivity of the "new biology," the opportunities for helping patients in the nation's hospitals are greater than ever before. Yet in 1981 the Reagan Administration insisted on cutting funding of basic biomedical research in our universities.

As to the Administration's commitment to enhance our national security, I would have thought it obvious that today's defense rests fundamentally on yesterday's basic science. The laser, for example, though happily of great use to medicine, communications, chemistry and physics, among others, is also at the heart of a number of weapons systems. Every Administration for the past 40 years has recognized the fundmental importance of basic science to the defense effort.

And what of the humanists and social scientists studying the cultures, politics and economics of our allies and adversaries? How can this country conduct an informed foreign policy without a flow of experts on the various areas of the world? We have only a dribble and it is in danger of evaporating further still.

The Department of Defense (D.O.D.) is trying to help. In a memo to Pentagon officials, Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger has warned: "The national base of basic research is inadequate to meet future D.O.D. needs and substantial sustained real growth in defense research is needed to restore this base." Although the Pentagon estimates that it will increase spending for basic research at universities by some $60 millions during the current fiscal year, this comes nowhere near compensating for the hundreds of millions of basic research dollars cut from other programs. And, unlike the beleaguered National Science Foundation and National Institutes of Health, which have funded broad areas of fundamental research, the Pentagon's concept of "basic" research, in line with legal, fiscal and political constraints, must be directed toward projects of identifiable value to the military.

If the American university research base is not to be saved by the Pentagon, what about corporate philanthropy? "The level of industrial support for university research may triple in the 1980's," said Dr. Edward E. David Jr., president of the Exxon Research and Engineering Company, "but that would not equal the proposed cuts in the Federal budget in only one year." Last fall, the Exxon Education Foundation, aware that in recent years doctoral candidacies in engineering have declined by one-third, announced a program sensitive to the impending shortage of faculty members (between 10 and 15 percent of engineering faculty positions across the nation are currently unfilled). The foundation divided $15 million for graduate fellowships and junior faculty salary support among 66 engineering schools, a boost for which all 66 of us are grateful. Neither Exxon nor its beneficiaries claim these new, thinly spread grants are more than a small step in the long journey toward an answer to the question: Who will be left to teach the next generation of engineers?

Increases in corporate contributions to higher education in recent years are heartening. "Total corporate aid to higher education has risen to the billion-dollar-per-year range," observed Edward G. Jefferson, chairman of Du Pont and one of the leaders in corporate support for higher education. Yet, he added, "it is unlikely that corporate aid can be expected to offset reductions in Government funding."

The proposition that Federal cuts create incentives for private gifts is dangerously deceptive. In fact, Federal dollars on campus are frequently necessary to generate private dollars—both from increased numbers of students and from private philanthropy. When Federal aid was climbing, so was the quality of graduate students attracted to well-financed research projects and prominent professors whose distinction in teaching was matched by excellence in grant-supported research. As Federal assistance declines, the quality of research deteriorates, new funds dry up, old sources of support wither.

President Reagan's science adviser, George Keyworth, agrees that "the heaviest responsibility for basic research naturally falls on the Government. This is especially true where long-term, high-risk research is involved. . . ." Those are reassuring words, but the numbers are less cheering. The President's latest budget requests call for substantial cuts in the research and development funds of most Federal agencies and departments.

Overall, according to Frank Press, president of the National Academy of Sciences, the latest cuts proposed by the President would take away another $600 million from the $5.5 billion Federal Budget for basic research. The resistance of Congress has so far spared the National Science Foundation's budget for the physical sciences, mathematics and engineering—at least for the moment they are scheduled to receive nominal increases—but funding for science education was cut by more than two-thirds.

Programs for basic research have always been easy to cut. They do not pack the political punch of urgency and quick results. From 1968 to 1980, according to Richard Atkinson, Chancellor of the University of California at San Diego and former director of the National Science Foundation, basic research as a fraction of the Federal budget declined by 27 percent and as a fraction of the gross national product by 16 percent.

The abruptness of many Federal cuts aggravates the problem. Following a meeting in October with Administration officials in Washington, nearly 100 distinguished scientists issued this statement: "Instability and abrupt changes in funding have severe effects: Research teams are broken up; investments in experiments involving large facilities . . . are poorly used. The continued flow of new researchers into our industrial and university laboratories is best maintained by their stable and continued participation in university-based graduate research."

"Basic science is a long-term investment, and depends on government support," stated the scientists. "Support of scientific research is a public expenditure from which all sectors of society benefit. There are no significant sources of support for such a collective benefit which can replace the Federal Government."

Without a major increase in Federal support for research projects and assistance to students, there will almost certainly be a further weakening of this nation, as countries with the sense to anticipate the future assume the lead. "The strength of the nation's research and development comes back to the strength of our top universities," acknowledged Dr. Keyworth. "We must restore strength to them."

As the President's science adviser, Dr. Keyworth reflects the Administration's views on the importance of the nation's leading universities. At the same time, the President has a profound commitment to preserving the vitality of the private sector. In his commencement address at Notre Dame last year, he said: "If ever the great independent colleges and universities are replaced by tax-supported institutions, the struggle to preserve academic freedom will have been lost."

But if these convictions are not impressed on the budget makers who have been hacking away at higher education, this Administration is in danger of going down in history as the great ravager of our independent colleges and universities.

The President can still lead us away from that destructive fate. Congress, in resisting major student aid and research cuts, has shown that it will follow if the Administration will lead in building on what we have.

Not only should the Administration renew the research capability of the nation's universities by restoring the cuts in basic reseach support, it should upgrade scientific equipment in our deteriorating university laboratories and establish a national construction fund to help rebuild university research facilities.

In addition to preserving the in-school interest subsidy, the Reagan Administration should:

Continue to make loans available to every student who shows genuine need. After all, these loans are made by private institutions, not the Government, and repayment is the obligation of the student. Besides, declining interest rates will cut much much more of this program's costs than any of the pending proposals for change.

Restore the cuts in the Pell Grant and related Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant programs. During the past academic year, Pell Grants closed the gap for 2.7 million students. This year the gap is wider, with $300 million already slashed from the program.

Increase support for Work-Study, the program that makes it possible for students to find jobs in a tight economy so that they can work their way through college.

Carry out the program of merit graduate fellowships that became law as the Education Amendments of 1980 but that has yet to receive an appropriation.

These measures can be funded through savings from cuts that should not be reversed—$2 billion through the elimination of Social Security's financial aid feature and billions more from changes in the Guaranteed Student Loan Program already enacted.

Should more than those savings be invested in higher education and research? All I ask is that our elected representatives look at the way our money has been used, and with what results from the G.I. Bill of Rights to the National Science Foundation and National Institutes of Health to the Pell Grant. Is there a more productive and broadly beneficial investment in human resources and the nation's future than a strong Federal commitment to the American university?

THE PASSING OF JOHN HAY WHITNEY

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, many of us in this Chamber—indeed much of the world—learned this morning with great sadness of the death of John Hay Whitney, one of our Nation's most respected and dedicated leaders in the communications industry and our former Ambassador to the Court of St. James.

I learned the news late yesterday, when my good friend and revered former colleague, Senator Jacob Javits, called to inform me of Ambassador Whitney's death. Senator Javits was a friend of Jock Whitney for 35 years and he asked if I would not be willing to relate some of his thoughts about Mr. Whitney to Members of this body, a task which I am, of course, honored and happy to perform.

As Senator Javits notes, one of the most splendid things about Jock Whitney was the manner in which he employed his considerable wealth to advance his belief that those in the minority of society could be assisted so that they would arrive at an equal starting point with society's majority. In this respect, he was a leader both in the method of this assistance—which Whitney believed could be accomplished through the process of education—and in the effect of this assistance—which Whitney believed could be chronicled, supported, and promoted by those in communications.

As a result of his work, Jock Whitney became a wonderful example of how wealth can ennoble rather than corrupt the human spirit, a trait which Senator Javits lists among Mr. Whitney's finest.

Mr. Whitney's devotion to principle and to causes so deeply important to the fabric of our society, was reflected in his service to our country throughout his many years. He was a soldier during the Second World War, was captured by the Germans, and managed to escape. He was U.S. Ambassador to Great Britain. In the 1950's, he became publisher of the New York Herald Tribune and kept the newspaper going for years by large expenditures of his own fortune. He achieved, as Senator Javits remarked, a kind of journalism that was at once both eloquent and of lasting importance for the city of New York.

He continued his tradition of journalistic excellence by publishing the International Edition of the Herald Tribune in Paris, and he had the wisdom to associate that endeavor with two of America's finest journalistic institutions, the New York Times and the Washington Post. In that cooperative arrangement, the Herald Tribune remained a model of international journalism, a vigorous champion of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, and at the same time, served to remind the preeminent press of America of the standards which they worked to exhibit throughout the world.

Senator Javits concluded, and rightly so, that Mr. Whitney was a noble person, well worth our note as a distinguished citizen of America, and a source of great pride for the State of New York.

Mr. President, those are indeed sentiments that I share. I would only add to Senator Javits' heartfelt memory of John Hay Whitney my own profound sorrow at his loss and I would wish to express, on behalf of this body, our condolences to his widow and their two daughters.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two articles concerning Mr. Whitney, from this morning's Washington Post and New York Times, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 9, 1982]

JOHN HAY WHITNEY DIES AT 77; PUBLISHER LED IN MANY FIELDS

John Hay Whitney, master of one of the great American fortunes and a pace-setting leader in a kaleidoscope of fields, died yesterday in North Shore Hospital, Manhasset, L.I., of congestive heart failure. He was 77 years old.

A friend once said that for Mr. Whitney "money had three purposes: to be invested wisely, to do good with and to live well off."

Sportsman, investor, publisher, philanthropist, political mover and ambassador, he hated to lose at anything, from polo to racing to golf to bridge to investing.

VARIED BUSINESS INTERESTS

Mr. Whitney's business interests were diverse. Through his Whitney Communications Corporation, he had significant interests, at one time or another, in Parade, a Sunday newspaper supplement; Interior Design, a trade magazine; Art in America magazine; the International Herald Tribune Company; 25 small newspapers, five television stations and six radio stations.

He had one great disappointment—his inability to save The New York Herald Tribune, which he took over as editor in chief and publisher in 1961. E. J. Kahn Jr., his biographer, said the paper had "meant the most to him of any of his enterprises," and Whitney Communications poured nearly $40 million into the effort.

Jock Whitney—the nickname dates from childhood—delighted in savoring the deluxe things in life, and he enjoyed great wealth; estimates early in 1982 put his fortune through inheritance and his own efforts at more than $200 million.

In his first full-time job, Mr. Whitney received $65 a month in 1929 as a clerk and worked his way up to $50 a week for the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Company, as Mr. Kahn described it in "Jock: The Life and Times of John Hay Whitney." But the young clerk was also an early investor in Aviation Corporation of America, which evolved into Pan American World Airways.

He founded J. H. Whitney & Company in 1946 as a venture capital company, and its first major investment of $1.25 million in the Spencer Chemical Company doubled in a year.

Also in 1946, Mr. Whitney started the John Hay Whitney Foundation, and he long contributed about $1 million a year to it.

The foundation emphasizes help for "those groups that experience racial, gender or economic discrimination" to seek educational, social and economic changes in their communities. Mr. Whitney held out a vision of friends and neighbors working on immediate problems rather than grandiose social change.

Mr. Whitney was a solidly built man who stood 6 feet 1 inch. His ruddy face was generally set in seriousness, an appearance accentuated by his eye-glasses. He was an amiable companion nonetheless, but with a limited fund of small talk. His friendships included horse trainers and jockeys, professional men and men of public affairs, artists and fellow millionaires.

In conversation Mr. Whitney was direct and to the point, a trait that startled some diplomats when he was Ambassador to Britain from 1957 to 1961. He had taken the post with some misgivings, yielding in the end to a request from President Dwight D. Eisenhower.

FRIEND OF EISENHOWER

Mr. Whitney was a frequent bridge and golfing partner of General Eisenhower, and a substantial contributor to the general's Presidential campaigns. He spent about $100,000 a year of his own money to maintain the social side of his diplomatic life.

Mr. Whitney made his Manhattan home in a duplex on Beekman Place in recent years, closing a town house on East 63d Street while subway construction was going on underneath.

He also maintained a 500-acre estate and mansion, Greentree, in Manhasset; a spacious summer house on Fishers Island, off New London, Conn.; a 12-room place at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., for occupancy during the August race meeting there; a 15-room hideaway in the heart of 19,000 acres of bird country and cornfields at Greenwood, Ga.; a modest golf cottage at Augusta, Ga., and a flat in London.

He could also bunk at Greentree Stables, near Lexington, Ky., a 1,000-acre horse farm whose ownership he shared with his sister, the late Joan Whitney Payson, who was once the principal owner of the New York Mets baseball team.

What really dazzled visitors to the 63d Street town house was Mr. Whitney's art display. More than 55 items from his collection, among the finest in private hands, dotted the walls. These included two Rembrandts, two Michelangelos, three Picassos and a number of works by Vuillard, Monet, Cézanne, Degas, Manet, Toulouse-Lautrec, Renoir, Pissarro and Braque.

In addition, there was a sizable collection of Matisses, Mr. Whitney's favorite modern artist, whose pictures traveled with him from house to house.

Mr. Whitney was regarded by his associates as a thoughtful person, not given to vulgar display or to flaunting his position.

"I've never known Jock to throw his weight around," a close associate once remarked. "He's a team player. He's usually a quiet member of a board. When he has suggestions, they're usually good ones; I've never known him to put the Whitney interests above the company's."

John Hay Whitney was born in Ellsworth, Me., on Aug. 17, 1904, the second child of Payne and Helen Hay Whitney. His sister, Joan, had preceded him by 14 months. She was to become Mrs. Charles Shipman Payson.

Their maternal grandfather, John Hay, was secretary to President Lincoln, Ambassador to Britain and Secretary of State under Presidents William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt. Their paternal grandfather was William C. Whitney, Secretary of the Navy under President Grover Cleveland. The family fortune was accumulated largely in oil, tobacco, street railways and real estate.

Jock Whitney graduated from Groton before going on to Yale, where he played polo and stroked for the crew. Rheumatic fever kept him out of school for two months and off the crew in 1924. It left him with a slight disability in his elbows.

MASTERED SPEECH DIFFICULTY

Mr. Whitney stuttered and lisped as a small boy, but he conquered both afflictions in later years. Poor eyesight hampered him most of his life, and he had to wear thick-lensed spectacles.

After his graduation from Yale in 1926, Mr. Whitney spent a year at Oxford, intending at the time to pursue a career in literature or publishing. The death of his father in 1927 cut short his academic life, and he returned home to help manage the family fortune. In the 1930's, Mr. Whitney was a six-goal polo player, captain of the Greentree team that won national championships.

In 1933, he organized Pioneer Pictures, which produced the first technicolor movie film short.

From 1936 to 1940, Mr. Whitney was chairman of the board of Selznick International Pictures, which he formed with David O. Selznick. Mr. Whitney bought the movie rights to Margaret Mitchell's "Gone With the Wind" for $50,000, and it was produced by Selznick International at a cost of $4.25 million. In 10 years, it grossed $33 million. By 1976 the film had taken in more than $74 million.

On Broadway, Mr. Whitney backed "Life With Father" and two plays that lost money, "Here Goes the Bride" and "Jumbo."

CAPTURED BY GERMANS

Soon after the United States entered World War II, Mr. Whitney gave up his Washington job, went to officers' candidate school and became a captain in the Army Air Force. He served in Britain for a time in public relations and intelligence, then was sent to North Africa on the staff of Gen. Ira C. Eaker as a liaison officer. On a mission to southern France soon after the American landing there in 1944, Mr. Whitney, then a colonel, was captured by the Germans and held prisoner for 18 days.

With several others, he escaped from a train that was taking the group through France to a prison camp in Germany. He was found by French Resistance fighters and was eventually returned to his own lines.

For his war service, Mr. Whitney received the Legion of Merit, with a citation for "exceptionally meritorious conduct in the performance of outstanding services," and the Bronze Star. He was also named a Commander of the Order of the British Empire.

ACTIVE IN 1952 CAMPAIGN

After the war, Mr. Whitney turned his attention again to business—and to philanthropy. Through the John Hay Whitney Foundation, a program of John Hay Whitney Opportunity Fellowships was established. These were annual awards to "American citizens of exceptional promise who, because of arbitrary barriers such as race, cultural background or region of residence, have not had the fullest opportunity to develop their abilities."

An active Republican in the 1950's, Mr. Whitney served as finance chairman of Citizens for Eisenhower-Nixon in 1952. In 1954, he was chairman of the United Republican Finance Committee for the State of New York.

In 1958, he acquired control of The Herald Tribune, an independent Republican morning newspaper, while he was still Ambassador to Britain. Previously, he lent the paper $2 million and took an option to buy it. He took active charge of the paper when he returned from London in 1961, listing himself as editor in chief and publisher, in that order.

A DAY OF MOURNING

Neither Mr. Whitney's exertions nor those of his advisers were able to halt the paper's steady decline. In 1966 there was a plan to merge The Herald Tribune with two afternoon newspapers, The World-Telegram and The Journal-American. A long strike blocked the start of the plan, and in August 1966 Mr. Whitney ended the still idled Herald Tribune. In announcing the paper's demise, Mr. Whitney said, "I feel that today is a day of mourning, rather than recriminations."

Mr. Whitney retained an interest in the merged enterprise, which began publication of an afternoon paper called The World Journal Tribune, but the new paper lasted just eight months.

Shortly before he closed The Herald Tribune, Mr. Whitney sold a share in its Paris edition to The Washington Post. In May 1967, The New York Times gave up its own international edition, joining the other enterprises to publish under the nameplate of The International Herald Tribune, with Mr. Whitney as chairman.

STATEMENT FROM WALTER THAYER

The Whitney Communications Corporation holds 36⅔ percent of the ownership; The Times 33⅓ percent and The Washington Post 30 percent. Walter N. Thayer, president of the International Herald Tribune Corporation, said yesterday that Whitney Communications "will certainly continue its interest."

In 1971, the Whitney subsidiary that controlled the broadcast interests, the Corinthian Broadcasting Corporation, was merged into Dun & Bradstreet.

Mr. Whitney, who consequently became the largest individual stockholder in Dun & Bradstreet, with direct and indirect holdings exceeding 7 percent of that company's outstanding shares, became a member of its board of directors.

Through J. H. Whitney & Company, Mr. Whitney profited from a number of investments, including those in Minute Maid and the Spencer Chemical Company.

Mr. Whitney led an active sports life. He played vigorous polo for many years and was a golfer and a court-tennis player. He shot pool and swam. And he was an enthusiastic bird shooter.

The turf, however, was Mr. Whitney's most abiding sporting interest. Like his grandfather and his parents, Mr. Whitney delighted in breeding horses and watching them run. He served as chairman of the board of the American Thoroughbred Breeders Association and director of the Saratoga Association for the Improvement of the Breed of Horses.

He also served as steward of the Jockey Club, a member of the New York State Racing Commission, president of the Thoroughbred Racing Association and a member of the board of governors of the Turf and Field Club.

Mr. Whitney started racing in Britain where he studied at Oxford in 1927, and continued to race horses there as well as in the United States until World War II, when he put his horses in his mother's Greentree Stables.

STABLE A PROFITABLE VENTURE

After the elder Mrs. Whitney's death in 1944, Mr. Whitney and his sister ran the stable. One of the most renowned of its horses was Tom Fool, undefeated "horse of the year" in 1953.

In 16 starts in 1949 the three-year-old won six times, was second twice and showed six times. His earnings were $238,335. From 1946 through 1966, Greentree horses earned about $6 million.

Mr. Whitney's public-service activities were numerous in New York, where he served as chairman of the board of the Museum of Modern Art and as president of New York Hospital.

He was also a trustee of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, vice president of the National Gallery of Art in Washington, a fellow of the Yale Corporation and a board member of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

$15 MILLION GIFT TO YALE

His singular devotion to his alma mater, Yale, was demonstrated spectacularly in 1970, when he gave the university $15 million for the construction of student housing to alleviate the overcrowding that developed when Yale became coeducational the year before. A Yale professorship in the humanities was named for him in 1977 and endowed largely by contributions from his friends.

He married twice. His first wife was the former Mary Elizabeth Altemus, and their marriage in 1930 was the high point of the Philadelphia social season. They were divorced in 1940, and Mrs. Whitney received a $3 million settlement.

In March 1942, he married Betsy Cushing Roosevelt, the former wife of James Roosevelt, the eldest son of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Mr. Whitney, who was childless, adopted her two daughters, Sara Wilford and Kate Whitney. His wife and daughters survive along with eight grandchildren.

A funeral service is to be held Friday at 11 A.M. at Christ Episcopal Church, 1355 Northern Boulevard, Manhasset, of which he was a member.

PUBLISHER, FORMER AMBASSADOR JOHN HAY WHITNEY DIES

(By J. Y. Smith)

John Hay (Jock) Whitney, 77, who was born into one of America's wealthiest families and went on to notable careers in diplomacy, publishing, film productions and the worlds of art and thoroughbred horse racing, died yesterday at North Shore Hospital in Manhasset, N.Y. He had a heart ailment.

Mr. Whitney was the U.S. ambassador to Great Britain from 1956 to 1961. He assumed the post in the aftermath of the ill-starred British-French-Israeli invasion of Egypt following the nationalization of the Suez Canal. This incident strained relations between Britain and the United States and Mr. Whitney was counted an asset in restoring normal good will.

While he was in Europe, Mr. Whitney began investing in the venerable, ailing and widely admired New York Herald-Tribune. But not even the Whitney millions and lavish infusions of new talent could turn it around. In 1966, in a final effort to save it, it merged with two other newspapers, The New York World-Telegram & Sun, and The New York Journal-American. On Aug. 16, 1966, the World-Journal-Tribune ceased publication, a victim of the dynamics of the New York newspaper market rather than a lack of entrepreneurial skill.

It was, perhaps the only major setback for Mr. Whitney in a business career that began in the traditional and conservative purlieus of Wall street; went on to the high-rolling, high-flying, and, as it turned out, highly profitable backing of Broadway productions and films; and continued with the provision of venture capital for new enterprises through J. H. Whitney & Co., which the future ambassador founded in 1946.

Mr. Whitney never disclosed what his losses at the newspaper were. But it did not discourage him from publishing. He held on to The Herald-Tribune's European subsidiary, the Paris Herald-Tribune; bought "Parade," a national newspaper supplement; invested in five magazines, including Newsweek, Scientific American and Polo (in his younger days, he was a world-class polo player), and became chairman of Whitney Communications Corp., which through a subsidiary, has interests in 29 small newspapers in Maryland, Delaware and Florida.

At his death, Mr. Whitney remained chairman of the International Herald Tribune, which is published jointly by Whitney Communications, The Washington Post Co. and The New York Times Co.

In a statement issued at his death, Katharine Graham, the chairman of The Washington Post Co., said: "Jock Whitney was a wonderful friend. . . . Newspeople everywhere will remember the superb job he did in building the great staff at the Tribune, many of whom are the leaders of today's newsrooms all over the country."

Mr. Whitney's communications enterprises came to him after he had added several other fortunes to the $20 million he is said to have inherited from his father, Payne Whitney, and another $20 million he inherited from his mother, Helen Hay Whitney.

Like many of his class, he began with an ordinary job in a Wall Street brokerage firm. Much time went to polo and similar pastimes. In the 1930s, however, he began to make large investments of his own—and he chose as his field the fickle milieu of Broadway. Fortune showered its favors upon him, for among the shows he backed were the longrunning classics "Life With Father" and "Streetcar Named Desire."

Then he branched into films, serving as chairman of Selznick International Pictures from 1936 to 1940. The company's productions included "Rebecca" and "Gone With the Wind," both of which were Academy Award winners. "Gone With the Wind" also was one of the great money-makers of all time. It is said that Mr. Whitney paid $50,000 for the movie rights to the novel, which was written by Margaret Mitchell, and turned an after-tax profit of $1.5 million on the film.

With the onset of U.S. involvement in World War II, Mr. Whitney went into public service. His first job in Washington was as director of the motion picture division in the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, which was headed by Nelson A. Rockefeller.

He later was commissioned a captain in the Army Air Force. He was sent to England and then to the Mediterranean, where he became a colonel on the staff of Gen. Ira C. Eaker, the commander of Allied air forces in that theater. In the summer of 1944, he and four companions were captured by German troops in southern France. They escaped from a train and 18 days later made their way to friendly lines. Mr. Whitney received the Legion of Merit, the Bronze Star, membership in the Order of the British Empire and the rank of chevalier in the French Legion of Honor.

After the war, he divided his capital into four parts. He kept two parts for his personal investments and expenses. A third part went to J. H. Whitney & Co. to generate capital for risky investments. The fourth went to the John Hay Whitney Foundation, the main vehicle for his philanthropies.

The foundation provided scholarships and fellowships to exceptional students handicapped by arbitrary barriers such as race, cultural background or region of residence. It also enabled scholars to go to small, independent schools to teach as visiting professors.

In the public policy sector, the foundation undertook a major study of labor-management relations called "The Causes of Industrial Peace Under Collective Bargaining." Through a series of case studies, it examined ways that labor and management reach agreement. Thus, it emphasized accommodation rather than confrontation. It is regarded as a classic in its field.

As a sportsman, Mr. Whitney enjoyed international ranking in the 1920s and 1930s as a polo player. In 1935 and 1936, he captained the team that won successive U.S. Opens. He later became a major figure in thoroughbred racing. His mother operated the famed Greentree Racing Stable near Lexington, Ky., and she was known as "The First Lady of the American Turf." She won most of the major races of her day and twice saddled winners of the Kentucky Derby. After her death, Mr. Whitney and his sister, Joan Whitney Payson, continued to breed horses at Greentree. They had the horse of the year in 1949 and again in 1953.

Mr. Whitney was a steward of the Jockey Club, a member of the New York State Racing Commission, a president of the Thoroughbred Racing Association and a governor of the Turf and Field Club.

In the world of art, Mr. Whitney had an important collection of modern French and American paintings. He was a trustee of the Museum of Modern Art and a former trustee and vice president of the National Gallery of Art. He was a member of the building committee for the National Gallery's spectacular new East Building.

Although many of his activities, such as polo and racing, were rich men's games, there was one convention that Mr. Whitney shunned. He refused to have his name listed in the "Social Register." He called the publication a "travesty of democracy" with "absurd notions of who is and who isn't socially acceptable."

John Hay Whitney was born on Aug. 17, 1904, in Ellsworth, Me., where his parents were vacationing. His family is said to have established itself in the New World in 1635. He was a maternal grandson of former secretary of state John Hay and a paternal grandson of former secretary of the Navy William C. Whitney. As a boy, he is said to have been pudgy and awkward and to have spoken with a stutter. These handicaps disappeared with time.

He was educated at Groton, Yale and Oxford. He then went to work on Wall Street. A lifelong Republican, he held a number of fundraising posts in the party and advisory posts in the government under President Eisenhower, who also was a personal friend. Eisenhower sent him to London as ambassador.

Mr. Whitney's possessions befitted his birth and station. In recent years, he ran his businesses from a 500-acre estate on Long Island that he inherited. He also had an apartment in New York City, a residence, track and stabling for 60 horses at Saratoga, N.Y., breeding farms in Aiken, S.C., and Lexington, Ky., and a 15,000-acre shooting preserve at Thomasville, Ga.

In 1930, he married Mary Elizabeth Altemus. They were divorced in 1940. In 1942, he married Betsy Cushing Roosevelt, former wife of James Roosevelt, the eldest son of President Roosevelt. She survives, as do her two daughters whom Mr. Whitney adopted, Mrs. Ronald Wilford and Kate Whitney, both of New York City.

EXCISE TAXES

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I recently had the honor to address the Distilled Spirits Council of the United States in Phoenix. In order to respond to the stated concerns of that industry, I was forced to think through in my own mind what my position would be were the Congress asked to deal with the current deficits by enacting new excise taxes. Like many of my colleagues, my initial response was positive. But after considering the matter more fully, I realized that this would not be a viable solution, but more importantly, it would be terribly unfair to the American public, especially lower income Americans.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that those remarks be printed in the RECORD at this point. I hope that the logical process that I went through will be of use to my colleagues as they address this important issue.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR DECONCINI

I greatly appreciate the opportunity to speak with you today.

Frankly, I am worried, and I want to share some of my concerns with you.

Each day, the economic statistics worsen, and the human tragedies mount. My office is flooded with pleadings from individuals thrown out of work, of homebuilders forced into bankruptcy, of young Americans who desperately want to own a home, like their parents and grandparents, but who cannot pay 17 or 18 percent for a mortgage.

Some mornings, I feel like we are in a war with the newspapers reporting new casualty figures or new battles lost. This is an economic battlefield and the enemy, unfortunately, is ourselves—more accurately, our policies.

The only two areas where we have made headway are inflation, which has abated to 8.9 percent, and interest rates, which have dropped slightly. However, the warning signs of a new round of inflation and higher interest rates are staring us in the face in the shape of astronomical Federal deficits.

After basing his campaign—and his years of criticism and commentary before the campaign—on fiscal irresponsibility as evidenced by an unbalanced Federal budget, the President is now faced with the prospect of a $100 billion deficit in fiscal year 1982, and $150 billion deficits in fiscal year 1983 and fiscal year 1984.

This must be highly distressing to the President and his advisers. It is certainly highly distressing to me. I have labored for the last 5 years to persuade Congress to adopt a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget except during times of emergency. I strongly believe that this Nation's economy will not get back on track until we have controlled the Federal colossus.

After 5 years in the Senate, I am absolutely convinced that Congress is incapable of exercising the restraint necessary to restrict Government growth in the face of so many pressures in the opposite direction. The statesmen among us are few and far between.

As long as we tolerate large deficits, we will also have to tolerate inflation and high interest rates. As long as we tolerate large deficits, we will be bemoaning the lack of investment in the private sector.

As inevitably as night follows day, deficits in the $100- to $150-billion range will push prices and interest rates up while simultaneously crowding private borrowers out of the market. The result—Stagflation! That insidious combination of recession, inflation, and high interest rates that has become the chronic illness of the late 20th century.

But the interesting question is how a President so sincerely committed to balancing the Federal budget may be forced to preside over the largest deficits in our 200-year history?

The answer, I think, is relatively simple. First, the President is right in stating that he inherited a basic deficit as a holdover from the Nixon-Ford-Carter years. Second, the recession wreaks havoc with the Federal budget by lowering tax revenues and increasing Federal payments so that the net effect is approximately $25 billion for each percentage point of additional unemployment.

Third, the President deserves high marks for the effective and generally equitable manner in which he reduced Government outlays by approximately $37 billion—the largest single year cut. Those of us who supported the President in this, share his pride.

But the fourth point is the nitty-gritty of the tale, and it reflects a problem of our own making—not something inherited or something over which we exercise little control.

The Kemp-Roth tax cut has reduced Government revenues over a 5-year period by $750 billion! In a year of firsts, it is the single largest tax cut in our history! Before I criticize this package, let me state that I voted for it. I did so reluctantly and only after some crucial amendments I supported were passed, but I did vote for the tax cut. Thus, my comments should be viewed from the perspective of a friend, not an enemy of the cut.

But the simple fact is—the tax cut was too much, too soon. I now believe that tax cuts must follow budget cuts. Tax cuts must be roughly equivalent to budget cuts, not totally disproportionate to them. It is the tax cut which must bear primary responsibility for the huge deficit; and it is that same tax cut that must be manipulated if the deficit is to be brought within reasonable bonds. Other alternatives now appear either unworkable or unacceptable.

No one in the White House or in Congress believes for one moment that the budget can be cut enough to significantly reduce the deficit. Republican and Democrat, conservative and liberal, all agree on that point. That is not to say we cannot and should not continue to prune the tree of government—we should. It has grown too large and unwieldy. But our mandate is not to chop it down, nor is our mandate to remove such vital branches as social security, medicare, or defense.

The other proposal in great favor these days is a dramatic increase in Federal excise taxes. But there are some inherent difficulties with this approach.

The tax cut was designed to stimulate investment and productivity by placing more funds in the hands of groups likely to save and invest. In real terms, its benefits will be felt more by upper-income Americans than lower-income Americans. A dollar tax on a purchase means little if your salary is $50,000; it means quite a bit more if your salary is only $10,000.

It has been argued that tobacco and alcohol, especially, are luxuries, and probably not healthful at that. To some, at least, to increase taxes on such items serves a broader public good. I must confess that such reasoning troubles me. By taxing these items to discourage usage, we are using the tax code for a moral purpose which has not been fully explored. But beyond that, by using excise taxes, we only discourage and penalize the poor from using them, not the rich. If they are bad, they should be bad for rich and poor alike and they should be eliminated from the marketplace.

The other element of these taxes which troubles me is the impact on the States. Arizona, like practically every other State, is struggling with the cuts in Federal assistance just enacted. Alcohol and tobacco taxes have traditionally been a major source of revenue for the States which the Federal Government would now, effectively, preempt. How are the States to survive? Such questions must be addressed.

The final problem with exercise taxes is they will raise very little new revenue in comparison to the deficit they are expected to cure. Doubling the Federal tax on alcohol would raise little more than $2 billion. The truth is that new excise taxes would have little impact unless they were extended to gasoline. And if they are extended to gasoline, we then find ourselves quite outside the category of optional or luxury purchases. We find ourselves severely punishing precisely those groups that have been hardest hit by the bad economic times—the poor and the retired. Westerners will also be harder hit than Easterners because we rely more on the automobile.

Excise taxes on alcohol and tobacco are being proposed to pave the way for gasoline taxes. I simply cannot see how Congress can enact such regressive taxes in the wake of the Kemp-Roth tax cut. The American policy is built on fairness, and this is simply unfair.

Let me turn now to a subject of the gravest importance—important to you as an industry and to each of us as citizens.

THE VIEW FROM $204 A WEEK

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the human tragedy associated with the worsening economic recession is sometimes forgotten as we plow through the mountains of detached economic statistics. It is well to remind ourselves that we are ultimately speaking of people, and that it is to people that we, as legislators, are responsible.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that a very moving and powerfully written article by a victim of the recession, Vicki Williams, be printed in the RECORD at this point. I further ask that all of my colleagues read Ms. Williams' piece before the new round of budget cuts begins.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE VIEW FROM $204 A WEEK

(By Vicki Williams)

I consider myself the classic "poor overburdened taxpayer" that you hear so much about these days. I work for an electronics company and make $6.58 an hour which translates into $204 per week after deductions, $30.21 of which are Federal withholding taxes. I have a husband, laid off, whose unemployment compensation has run out, and a 13-year-old son who thinks he should have a leather coat, a P. K. Ripper motocross bike, a Pioneer stereo and an Asteroids game. It bothers me a lot that I can't afford to buy him any of these things. It also bothers me that I'm not sure how we're going to fill up the fuel tank often enough to stay warm this winter.

There is something else that bothers me, though not to the same extent as my son's unfulfilled desires or the ever-hungry fuel tank, and that is that every single politician and editorialist is positive he knows exactly what I think. Everyone seems to be wildly anxious to be my spokesman. Yet these people don't know a damn thing about how the "poor overburdened taxpayer" thinks or lives. I imagine it's been quite some time since most politicians or well-known journalists lived on $204 per week, though I've read plenty of complaints from congressmen about their meager salaries. One even said he had to sleep in his office because he couldn't afford to buy a house. Do you know how much pity I can spare for a senator who can't live on $60,000 a year?

Tired: I know I'm not as articulate as the people who write the editorials for newspapers and the speeches for politicians, but just once I'd like to have on the record the thoughts of an average taxpayer. I'm tired of these people putting their words in my mouth and their thoughts in my head.

One of the statements I read and hear most often is how fed up I'm supposed to be with the amount of my taxes that goes toward welfare, food stamps, programs for the elderly, subsidized school lunches and other supportive social services. Wrong! What the people "up there" don't understand is that I identify with the beneficiaries of these programs much more than I do with the politicians and the media people. "There, but for the grace of God, go I." So far, I have never had to rely on welfare, free lunches or Medicaid, but I very well might someday. When I was divorced, I could have qualified for welfare. Fortunately, I had parents who were in a position to help, but if I hadn't, you can believe I would have swallowed my pride rather than watch my son go hungry. People like me, who live only a hairbreadth from economic disaster, are glad those programs are out there, though we pray we'll never have to use them. We feel sympathy for the ones who do.

In 1977 my sister-in-law was abandoned by her husband. Her health did not permit her to work full time, so she drew $194 per month from the welfare department to support herself and her child. I doubt that anyone can think she lived extravagantly on $194 per month.

I think it's possible that at least one of the very same politicians who are now complaining about welfare recipients might have taken a political junket during one of the months that my sister-in-law and her son lived on $194. Believe me, I resent that junket at my expense much, much more than I resent helping an ADC mother, or buying eyeglasses for an elderly person or free lunches for a ghetto child.

To me, Reagonomics is cruel and self-serving. Reagan seems to be telling us that the United States is a sinking ship and that if we harden our hearts and throw a few people overboard, we can lighten the load. Then, possibly, the Ship of State can sail back to shore. I don't see my country quite that way. The philosophy behind the original structure of the United States is that we are a people who sink or swim together. We don't make human sacrifices.

If there is even one child in this country who is hungry or one old person who needs medical care, then I want my $1,570.92 in taxes to go toward helping that child or that old person. I think this country is based on the philosophy that when that $1,570.92 is gone, we will find more to take its place, as long as the need is there.

I know about the cheaters. There are always cheaters. They are a part of life as surely as death and taxes. Certainly, if they are caught, they should be punished and denied aid, but I know we'll always support some cheaters along with the "truly needy." If we have to give a free lunch to one child whose parents could afford to pay in order to give free lunches to nine children who genuinely deserve them, so be it.

Benefits: The much-touted tax cut doesn't make sense to me. Perhaps there's a complicated economic formula that explains the logic of a tax cut at the same time we're slashing Federal programs because of lack of funds, but if so, I missed it. I pay $30.21 per week to the Federal government. As I understand it, when all the tax cuts are in effect, I will only pay $22.66, giving me $7.55 extra to save or spend. Well, I could do a few things with $7.55 a week but, had I been consulted, I would have just as soon paid it and kept the food-stamp program or veteran's benefits intact. I suspect that the government will give it to me with one hand and take it away with the other.

You see, I really believe that most politicians and media people think that those of us out here in America who work in the factories and offices are ignorant. I believe that they think we will never catch on to their sleights of hand. I believe that they think they can tell us the grass is black one day and white the next and we'll never trust ourselves enough to look down and say, "Why, that grass isn't black or white—it's green!" Well, we know the grass is green. We just don't know what to do about it.

We don't really believe that 56 oil companies recorded 98 percent of the increase in all corporate profits from 1978 through 1980 for our benefit. We don't believe the tobacco subsidy is for our benefit. We don't believe that congressmen who were violently anti-AWACS magically changed their minds for our benefit. We know it's always us who pay the bills that result from the politicians' machinations.

I wish a politician would come along who'd tell me that the grass is green.

GLOBAL INTERDEPENDENCE IN THE 1980'S

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on January 13, the President of the World Bank, A. W. Clausen, delivered an address in Tokyo which I believe deserves wide attention. He presents a skillful analysis of the complex international economic scene, in which he points out that a simple distinction between North and South—industrial and developing countries—has lost considerable validity. He rather notes the role several groups of countries are playing in a world which has become much more economically interdependent over the past two decades.

Within this framework Mr. Clausen describes the role the World Bank can play. He rightly points out that the Bank is not "the United Way of the development community," redistributing wealth from one set of countries to another. Rather it is a hard-headed, unsentimental institution which is attempting to assist countries to accelarate economic growth and enhance the economic opportunities of its people. By doing so all countries in the world economic system benefit. I strongly commend this address to my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the remarks made by Mr. Clausen before the Yomiuri International Economic Society International Forum in Tokyo, Japan, "Global Interdependence in the 1980's," be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

GLOBAL INTERDEPENDENCE IN THE 1980'S

I think that much of the trouble that the international community has today in trying to get agreement on what ought to be done about the global economy is due to this: that virtually all of the parties to the dispute tend to get bogged down in vast oversimplifications.

The result is that oversimplifications about global economic models don't help very much. And I really don't think they help very much in international politics either. But I am not here to talk about politics. As President of the World Bank, my job is to be concerned with the health of the global economy, and all its various components.

Our 141 member countries, as well as those few societies that are not members of the World Bank, represent a huge amount of economic complexity. And that is why I believe that the old "North-South" economic model of the international economy of the 1960s and the '70s is no longer very useful.

So, without being dogmatic—and recognizing that the contours of the economic geography are in constant and dynamic movement—let me sketch out at least eight discernable poles of high economic significance in our current international environment.

Four of them are the centers of high industrialization: Western Europe, North America, Japan, and Eastern Europe. Another key group is that of the capital-surplus oil-exporting countries in the Middle East. There are the newly industrializing nations—some 20 of them. Add to this, the great populous countries of Asia: China, India, Indonesia, Bangladesh, Pakistan, and others. And finally, there are the severely poverty-stricken countries of Sub-Saharan Africa.

There is simply no doubt that we live today in a multipolar world. Each of these clusters of economic activity is involved in trade and investment with others. And as I say, though I have picked out eight such centers, it is quite possible to disaggregate them even further, and formulate much more complicated models.

It has become so static and so vastly oversimplified—and often so contentious and confrontational in its rhetoric—that it tends to obscure reality rather than illuminate it.

Labels and slogans, and buzz words and battle cries are very human phenomena—and have their place—but they normally aren't very useful for disentangling complexity. And that is what we have in the world economy today: a whole complicated ganglia of interdependent relationships, and a very dynamic environment in which they are all interacting.

What we need to do is to try to sharpen our vision of all this complication—not blur it.

Now, how will this environment be likely to evolve in the course of the 1980s?

The progress of the newly industrialized countries, and the development of the capital-surplus countries, will almost certainly result in their achieving a still bigger proportion of total world production. As a consequence, even with a respectable recovery from the present recession in Western Europe and North America, it is possible that these older industrial countries will by 1990 account for less than half of total world output, compared to over two-thirds in 1960.

At the same time, the newly industrialized countries—if we include Japan—may well account for over one-quarter of world production by the end of this decade, as compared to just one-twelfth in 1960.

We have to remind ourselves that there is simply no precedent in history for the dynamic rate of change in the geographic spread of global output in our era, and in the structure and character of world trade.

By 1990 that trade may well expand at a pace almost twice as fast as the growth in world output. In 1980, 23 percent of that output was traded; by 1990 it could well reach 30 percent.

Possibly four-fifths of such an increase in world trade will come from manufactured goods; and of that increase, the newly industrializing countries may well contribute a fourth. In other words, a much larger proportion of world demand for manufactured goods is likely to be supplied by these developing countries that are undergoing what can be termed history's "third industrial Revolution."

Conversely, it is likely that the developing countries' exports of commodities will grow at a considerably lower rate, which means that those economies that depend primarily on commodities for their export earnings will have to turn to other strategies to boost income for their development needs.

The probability, too, is that the newly industrializing countries will supply a much larger share of the traditional manufactured goods to the older industrial nations of Western Europe and North America. To compensate for the loss of this portion of their domestic markets, these nations are likely to give greater emphasis to products of high technology.

Indeed, technological advance is likely to be a principal source of these societies' future manufacturing growth, with the new silicon-chip technologies, and the overall explosion in the information and data-processing industries, perhaps leading the way.

Another characteristic of the decade ahead will, I believe, be the expanding role of the private sector in meeting the world's capital requirements.

We all know the story of the past ten years. It was the private sector that met the enormous needs for capital by both the developed and developing countries, once the surge in the price of petroleum had dramatically altered the terms of trade between different parts of the globe.

In 1970, the debt owed to private lenders by developing countries amounted to only 45 percent of the total. By 1980, this proportion had burgeoned to 65 percent: $284 billion out of $439 billion.

During these years it was the particularly remarkable growth of the Eurocurrency markets that made it possible to recycle the surpluses of the oil-exporting countries to many nations faced with mounting deficits.

The decade of the Eighties is likely to witness the advance of a number of other capital markets: those working out of such locales as Panama, Singapore, Hong Kong, Kuwait, and Bahrain. The growth of capital markets dispersed widely about the globe is, of course, a reflection of the broader geographical contributions to total world output. Dynamism in the capital markets is tied to dynamism in the global economy, and simply no longer fits into a narrow "North-South" configuration.

Still another characteristic of the decade ahead will, I believe, be an acceleration in the movement of workers across internatinal frontiers. Estimates are difficult to make since not all workers migrate legally, but there are today perhaps some 15 million foreign workers in North America, Western Europe, and the Middle East.

In the Middle East alone, the 4 million foreign workers already constitute 50 percent of the work force in some countries. And the movement of labor toward the newly industrializing countries has already begun: there are foreign workers in both Singapore and Hong Kong.

This whole vast movement of people across boundaries from labor-surplus countries to labor-deficit societies has introduced another dynamic in the global economic system that is not fully grasped today.

It is not inconceivable that another 10 million people may migrate as workers over the next decade. If they do, and if they remit funds to their families at roughly the same rate that their predecessors have, this capital flow alone (in 1980 prices) could amount to $40 billion a year by 1990.

The world trade in manufactured goods, the flow of private-sector financial resources, the movement of workers across international frontiers—all of this at historically unprecedented levels—means that by 1990 the world may well be qualitatively very different from what it is today.

It is from this perspective that my colleagues and I are thinking about the future of the World Bank.

The World Bank is, of course—and will remain—a bank. And a very sound and prudent bank. But it is more than just a bank. It is an international development institution, with most of the world's governments as its shareholders. And its membership is likely to increase.

It's essential role is to be catalytic. It facilitates sensible things happening in both its developing and developed member countries.

It brings finance, honest and disinterested advice, and invaluable technical assistance to bear on the highest priority objectives of its developing member countries—and it stays the course with them.

It is not in the business of redistributing wealth from one set of countries to another set of countries. It is not the Robin Hood of the international financial set, nor the United Way of the development community.

The World Bank is a hard-headed, unsentimental institution that takes a very pragmatic and non-political view of what it is trying to do.

And what it is trying to do is clear. As I have pointed out before, the World Bank's basic objective in any developing country is precisely the same: to assist the country both to accelerate its economic growth and enhance the economic opportunities of its people, and thus make possible a better standard of living for all.

The World Bank's mandate is to contribute to the economic success of its developing member countries, but it can only make that contribution if it retains the support of the governments and private markets of capital-exporting countries.

THE NEWS FROM EL SALVADOR: SLANTED

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, there are two parts to the tragedy that is El Salvador today. The first is a slide into civil war and anarchy that involves violent death to many innocent individuals every day. The second is a profound misunderstanding about the nature of the conflict in this torn Central American country. I very much fear that the American people are not getting good information about El Salvador.

For example, it is quite evident that most Americans do not know that the present Government of El Salvador is a revolutionary government. It is not a government of the entrenched oligarchy. There was such a government in power, but in 1979 there was a revolution, and that government was thrown out. It may be that since the revolution was relatively bloodless, as such things go, it was dismissed as just a palace coup by many people. But it was a revolution, a real one, with a real change in the ruling structure of the country.

Since 1979, what has been going on is counterrevolution. In fact, it has been a double counterrevolution: The revolutionary government, in power and struggling to deliver on the promise of its revolutionary ideal, has been attacked by the right, the oligarchists who were deposed; and at the same time by the left, the Communists and fellow travelers allied with the enemies of freedom all over the world.

This view of the problem in El Salvador is no secret. It has been mentioned in the more thoughtful journals, and in official State Department documents, but it remains unappreciated by the average American.

One reason, I would like to suggest, is that the popular news media, the major papers and television, cannot handle a reality even this complex. They find it much easier to simplify the equation, and cast the Salvadoran struggle as just good guys against bad guys. In this simplification, the government is identified with the right, and the guerrillas are the left, drawing strength from the peasants and the objects of official government terror.

The trouble with this simplification is that it is, quite simple, false. It is a distortion so severe as to hamper understanding and action. And yet it is the distortion produced by our news media.

In saying that, Mr. President, I do not rely just on my own observations. The slanting of news from El Salvador has been noticed by such impartial observers as Freedom House, which has recently released a report on El Salvador and on the nature of news coverage of the conflict. According to the author of the report, Mr. Bruce McColm, American reporters accept too readily the propaganda of the guerrilla groups, are ignorant of the history of El Salvador, do not speak the language, and report on deaths without telling who did the killing, or the activities of the killed. All of this produces an atmosphere in which the people are unjustifiably critical of U.S. policy of support for the revolutionary government of El Salvador.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a news story about the Freedom House report be printed at this point in the RECORD. The story appeared in the Fairfax Journal on February 4.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS EL SALVADOR NEWS SLANTED?

(By James Nelson Goodsell)

News coverage of the conflict in El Salvador has tended to be more critical of the Salvadoran government than of the leftist guerrillas—a tendency now under sharp attack.

The New York-based Freedom House, in an analysis of the coverage, says that reporting of the subject has been marred by "political bias, ideology, poor sources, and deliberate misinformation."

Moreover, the nonprofit and nonpartisan organization says that while stories on El Salvador datelined Washington are fairly straightforward, those written from the scene are often "simplistic," tend "towards propaganda," and often ignore complex issues such as land reform.

The Freedom House report calls for greater efforts by U.S. journalists to understand and report on the complexities of the El Salvador issue. Land reform, in the view of the report, has not received much coverage "partly because of the undramatic nature of the programs and partly because they do not coincide with the portrayal of the government as right wing and repressive."

Further, the Freedom House report charges that the U.S. press:

Has overplayed the role of the Frente Democratico Revolucionario (FDR), the political arm of the leftist guerrillas, inflating "the image of Guillermo Ungo into a leader with a popular following within his country." In point of fact, the FDR is the conduit for press comments from the guerrillas, whose leaders have chosen not to make themselves available to the U.S. press.

Portrays the dead "not as war casualties but as victims of human-rights violations" and further does not indicate that often those killed were "people . . . actively involved with the guerrillas." Although Amnesty International and other human-rights organizations make these distinctions, the press more often than not fails to do so.

Reports massacres, killings, and disappearances without giving "any indication of who might be responsible or, worse, blaming right-wing forces in such a way that, though they might have no connection to the government, the government is nonetheless seen as the culprit." In addition, these presentations are not balanced "with coverage of leftist terrorism."

The Freedom House report is certain to please the government of Salvadoran President Jose Napoleon Duarte and the Reagan administration. Both are under sharp editorial attack in the U.S. press—the Duarte government for its alleged human-rights violations and the Reagan administration for its support of the Duarte government.

But the report is not a whitewash of the Duarte government. It recognizes that, while there are reformist-minded military men in El Salvador, there are other elements within the military, or close to it, that are bent on resisting change.

What the report asks for essentially is a more even-handed treatment of the story than it has received so far.

In this connection, the report, which was written by Bruce McColm, who heads Freedom House's Caribbean Basin Program, says the Latin American press "has covered the situation on the ground more thoroughly than its North American counterpart (and) is more balanced and more realistic about communist influence."

Washington and U.S. policy have come in for a share of criticism in this Latin coverage—this criticism resting "not on any sensational findings in the country, but rather on the military rhetoric employed by State Department spokesmen explaining American policy."

The Freedom House report argues also that little of El Salvador's history is known or understood by the reporters.

And the report states that too few of the newsmen, especially from the television press, "were people who spoke Spanish."

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, part of the confusion about the reality in El Salvador can be attributed to a massive disinformation effort being carried on by leftist guerrillas and their abettors in this country. These abettors, needless to say, include radical and Communist-oriented groups. In last summer's issue of New Guard, Mr. Peter T. Flaherty outlined the nature of the El Salvador protest movement, going so far as to reproduce the broadsides and pamphlets being distributed in this country by these groups. I found the Flaherty article fascinating, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD, so that my colleagues can get some flavor of what is going on in this respect.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EL SALVADOR PROTEST MOVEMENT

(By Peter T. Flaherty)

In recent months, Americans have witnessed a flurry of activity by groups opposed to U.S. aid to El Salvador. College campuses have been the scene of rallies and film showings. A number of demonstrations have taken place in major cities, highlighted by a May 3rd "March on the Pentagon." A variety of church and church auxiliary groups have become heavily involved with the issue.

To date, opponents of U.S. aid have managed to generate publicity in greater proportion than their numbers would warrant because of the highly visible activities they have sponsored. Most of their "cadre" has been recruited from left-wing groups, activist circles in the Church, and from what remains of the left on campus.

There is little evidence that the left has had the success with the El Salvador issue that it had with the Vietnam War in the 1960s. However, since it is unlikely that the Salvadoran conflict will be resolved in the near future, it is certain that opposition to U.S. aid will escalate. A major thrust can be expected on campuses around the country this fall. Therefore, it is essential that the background and goals of the groups that will be encountered are understood.

Thus far, the media have failed to identify the groups' connection to foreign governments in their accounts of demonstrations and other activities. The task is further complicated by the aura of legitimacy lent the movement by the heavy participation of religious leaders.

However, no mistake can be made. A close examination reveals a nationwide network of groups that has direct and indirect links to international terrorists and the Soviet disinformation system. The groups actively aid Soviet- and Cuban-backed guerillas in El Salvador who seek to establish a totalitarian state on the Marxist-Leninist model.

CISPES

The Committee In Solidarity with the People of El Salvador (CISPES), with local "solidarity" committees in hundreds of locales around the country, has become the primary organization at the grassroots in opposition to U.S. policy. There is hardly a campus in the United States where CISPES has not sponsored a teach-in, rally, or protest. The group played a major role in the highly-publicized "March on the Pentagon" on May 3rd.

CISPES not only campaigns openly for a FMLN/FDR guerrilla victory in El Salvador, but was actually organized as a result of a 1980 visit to major American cities by Farid Handal, a Salvadoran guerrilla leader.

The national solidarity movement that Handal founded was kicked off at conferences in Washington and Los Angeles in October 1980. The role that Handal, a frequent visitor to Havana and Moscow, played in organizing opposition to U.S. policy within the U.S. is detailed in a report he made to the Salvadoran Communist Party. It was captured in El Salvador and has been made available to American news media. According to the report, Handal's activities in the U.S. were aided by the Communist Party, U.S.A. and the Cuban Mission to the U.N. It strongly suggests that opposition to U.S. policy is the result of a "well-orchestrated effort" by international Communism, as charged by the Administration. President Reagan has noted that the campaign "has confused a great many people and many well-meaning people."

According to CISPES' own literature, the group not only calls for an end to U.S. aid (including humanitarian and economic) to El Salvador, but also supports the Democratic Revolutionary Front (Spanish acronym: FDR) as the "legitimate representative of the El Salvadoran people." CISPES has made the false representation that the FDR includes democratic non-Communist segments of Salvadoran society.

The FDR was formed in April 1980 by the Unified Revolutionary Directorate (Spanish acronym: DRU), the umbrella group of Salvadoran guerrilla leaders. The DRU was formed at a January 1980 meeting in Havana at which eight separate Marxist-Leninist groups put aside their ideological and tactical differences so they could qualify for larger-scale Cuban aid. The Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (Spanish acronym: FMLN) is the arm of the DRU responsible for executing the military insurgency. FMLN literature is prominent among the material distributed by CISPES in the United States.

The FDR functions primarily to distribute propaganda abroad for the real power behind the opposition in El Salvador—the DRU. The DRU is headed by Salvador Cayetano Carpio, the man likely to become dictator if El Salvador falls. The left wing American newspaper The Guardian glowingly refers to Carpio as the "Ho Chi Minh of the Salvador Revolution."

The FDR seeks to give the false impression that it enjoys the support of the non-Communist opposition in El Salvador. But both the major urban workers organization and the principal farm workers organization do not support it. General strikes and mass demonstrations called by the left have failed dismally, and the "final offensive" of last fall commanded no spontaneous support. The FDR is represented publicly by spokesmen like social democrat Guillermo Ungo, who enjoys the support of only a few hundred other social democrats within the country. Most important, however, is that non-Communist elements of the FDR are not represented on the DRU, which controls all the arms.

It is testimony to the FDR's disinformation efforts that it has, indeed, enlisted the support of segments of the democratic left around the world. But a better guide to its strategy and goals than its public pronouncements is provided in a recently captured FDR internal document. The communication, dated February 3, 1981, is directed to the DRU command from FDR leader Guillermo Ungo at the FMLN/FDR Political Diplomatic Commission.

It lays out a proposal for the FDR to call for a political solution and enter into negotiations with the United States. But, as the proposal admits, this would be a tactical maneuver designed only to buy time while the guerrillas regroup for another military offensive. The stated objective of the plan is "to gain time to improve our military situation in relation to the strength of the enemy" before terminating discussions.

The plan's most interesting feature is the suggestion to enlist the participation of the Socialist International and European Social Democratic politicians as mediators for such talks. Also, U.S. Congressmen would be encouraged to call for a "dialogue," and acting Salvadoran Archbishop Rivera y Damas would be contacted to support such discussions.

The plan is already being pursued. On February 25, the West German government offered to act as mediator and invited both sides in the "internal" dispute to come to Germany for talks. Another effort at mediation by the Socialist International fell through when its officials learned of the "negotiations maneuver" document. But CISPES and other opponents of U.S. aid still are vigorously promoting a "political solution." It comes as no surprise that an increasing number of American politicians and churchmen are falling into the "political solution" trap.

THE "MARCH ON THE PENTAGON"

The May 3rd "March on the Pentagon" was billed as an "anti-war" rally to protest U.S. aid to El Salvador. The New York Times described it as "organized by a coalition of religious, student, black and labor activists." However, to anyone in attendance, it was clear that it was a FMLN/FDR show from the outset.

One of the featured speakers was Arnaldo Ramos of the FDR. A "Message from the FMLN/FDR to the participants of the March of May 3, 1981" was distributed to those gathered to "extend our warmest greetings on behalf of the people in this event." The program was emceed by Heidi Tarver of CISPES and Larry Holmes of the People's Anti-War Mobilization (PAM), described as a cosponsor of the March.

Holmes is an official of the Marxist-Leninist Workers World Party (WWP). PAM press spokesman William Massey and two other key organizers of the March—Sara Flounders and Laurie Fiernstein—also are WWP activists. Elizabeth Ross, spokesman for the WWP, told Human Events that "We were initiators [of the March]. We've been working on it since January. We got all the other groups together and we did most of the work on it." Apparently, PAM is little more than a WWP front.

For the organizer of a rally purporting to support "human rights," the WWP takes some strange positions. Party spokesman Ross, for instance, stated that the WWP supported the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, Czechoslovakia in 1968 and Hungary in 1956.

Another speaker at the March was Rafael Cancel Miranda, one of the five Puerto Rico terrorists who fired upon and wounded five Congressmen on the floor of the House of Representatives in 1954. Pardoned by President Carter in 1979, Cancel Miranda said, "There is only one nation that looks similar to what I want for Puerto Rico and that is Cuba."

A "Message of Solidarity" was read from Philip Agee. He is a former CIA agent who wrote the book On Company Business and helped founded the anti-CIA magazine CounterSpy, which is best known for revealing the identity of American intelligence officer Richard Welch shortly before he was assassinated in Greece. Recently, CounterSpy charged that two American AFL-CIO officials working in El Salvador on the land reform program were linked to the CIA. Soon afterward, they were gunned down along with a Salvadoran peasant leader in a San Salvador restaurant.

The March's organizers had predicted a turnout of 100,000. But the highest estimate by the policy or any news organization was 25,000. CISPES' penchant for the truth is perhaps found in their "El Salvador Alert" newsletter of June 1 which insists 100,000 did indeed take part.

A quick survey of literature being distributed and banners the marchers carried showed a hodge-podge of Marxist groups. Included were the Communist Party U.S.A., Socialist Workers Party, Progressive Labor Party, Young Socialist Alliance, Youth Against War and Fascism, U.S. Peace Council, and the Young Spartacist League which passed out flyers saying "Military Victory to the Leftist Insurgents" and "Defense of the USSR and Cuba Begins in El Salvador." Also participating were the pro-PLO Palestine Solidarity Committee and the Iranian Student Association.

The first national protest march by opponents of U.S. aid to El Salvador failed to attract significant student support. This was evident by the "cadre" appearance of leftist groups who filed out of chartered buses into a carefully organized procession—in contrast to the highly spontaneous, anarchic nature of student marches in the Vietnam era.

Although the point for the most part was missed by the media, the May 3rd March was important in showing the nature of the organized opposition to U.S. aid. It demonstrated that the FMLN/FDR is actively involved in protest with the help of supporters in this country.

HUMANITARIAN AID AND THE FMLN-FDR

While CISPES and other groups have made no secret of their enthusiasm for a FMLN military victory, it does appear that they have been involved in a secretive ploy by which thousands of dollars collected for refugees have instead been used to purchase arms.

Incredible as it may seem, American church and anti-hunger groups, as well as thousands of individual citizens, have contributed to a front group under complete control of the DRU. Although its name, the Salvadoran Ecumenical Committee on Humanitarian Aid (Spanish acronym: CESAH), implies that it is administered by church leaders and benefits needy victims of the war, its resources are disbursed by guerilla leaders to aid those engaged in active fighting.

According to documents captured from the Communist Party of El Salvador, the guerillas received aid from the following sources: the World Council of Churches, $170,575; Catholic Relief Service, $154,254; United Churches, $16,351; Oxfam, $62,230; and from the United Methodist Committee on Relief and other church and human rights groups in the U.S. and Canada.

Certain Catholic groups have realized that they had been deceived by the Marxists and have withdrawn from CESAH to distribute their own humanitarian aid. However, the scam continues elsewhere, and local solidarity committees are busily engaged with the "CISPES Relief Campaign."

The organization of CESAH is detailed in the captured proposal Guillermo Ungo had sent to the DRU. CESAH would operate "to capture the maximum help for humanitarian purposes in benefit of the revolutionary process" and to "appear to be directed by persons not publicly identified with any revolutionary organization." But the proposal made it clear that DRU guerilla leaders would exercise complete control. According to the paper, CESAH "would not only put itself at the service of the revolutionary process, but would also depend on the DRU." This would be accomplished by placing key guerilla supporters at its apex, including an executive director who would implement the DRU's orders. "To give the organization respectability, we must offer honorary positions to the key religious persons such as the Archbishop and his aides, Protestant leaders, and sisters, and nuns." The ultimate purpose of CESAH is to assure that material aid goes to "revolutionary organizations, thus avoiding that CESAH will help the people who are running around." But the document adds that "we cannot ignore them completely, because they are part of any cover." "Them," of course, means the thousands of refugees caught in the middle of the fighting for whom the money is ostensibly collected. Instead, the funds are sent to two bank accounts—a secret one in Panama and one in Mexico controlled by Archbishop Mendes Arceo of Cuernava, who is well known for his pro-Castro sympathies.

But the charade goes on. CISPES' March 1st "El Salvador Alert" newsletter appeals for "material aid for the people of El Salvador. This campaign will help purchase food, clothing, and medicine. . . . CISPES sends the money donated to a special account managed by Msgr. Mendes Arceo, Archbishop of Cuernava in Mexico, who sees that the funds will reach the needy in El Salvador."

At least two U.S. based organizations also exploit the suffering of the Salvadoran people to raise money to promote the FDR line. The first is the Institute for Food and Development Policy (IFDP), headquartered in San Francisco. Its "Food First Action Alert" entitled "El Salvador—The Hungriest People in Latin America" shows a starving girl clutching her baby brother, who is also suffering from malnutrition.

The recipients of the flyer are urged to join CISPES in combatting U.S. intervention, the presumed cause of hunger in El Salvador. Also, a tax deductible contribution is solicited to support the Institute's acitivities—which do not include distributing food to the starving. Instead, it is used to distribute Marxist literature and films in the United States.

The IFDP staff consists of founder Joseph Collins, formerly of the Institute for Policy Studies/Transnational Institute, and David Kinley, formerly of the North American Congress on Latin America.

The second group is Oxfam-America, well known to many college students who it annually solicits on campus. At some schools, Oxfam asks students to fast for a day and have the campus food service turn over to it the costs of the saved meals.

Oxfam distributes a number of materials opposed both to the old system of private land ownership in El Salvador and the government's newer land reform system. Oxfam materials are distributed both by CISPES and IFDP.

Ironically, El Salvador was one of the few Third World nations that was a net exporter of food before the IFDP- and Oxfam-supported terrorist campaign.

CISPES AND THE CHURCH

Perhaps the most ironic aspect of the FMLN/FDR activity in this country is the deep involvement of churches and members of the clergy. This ostensibly reflects a drive by church leaders to stop the bloodshed that marks the tragedy of El Salvador. Instead, a number of church activists and denominations are integral participants in the guerilla support network.

Four of the five organizations that comprise the steering committee of CISPES are religious groups. Prominent members of the Catholic hierarchy have spoken out against U.S. aid and the Maryknoll and Jesuit orders are particularly visible in protest activities. The National Council of Churches, a consortium of 32 Protestant and Orthodox churches, has praised the FDR as the "legitimate representative" of the people of El Salvador.

Even more offensive to many church members than their leaders' individual proguerilla political activism is the use of religious observances and services for the purpose of political protest. Some Catholic churches have even offered the Mass for the "liberation of the people of El Salvador." The National Council of Churches encouraged congregations to engage in "massive activities during the Holy [Easter] Week" on behalf of leftist Salvadoran forces and held a press conference on Good Friday to "Dramatize the suffering of the people of El Salvador at the hands of the armed forces."

CISPES and the church groups have consistently misrepresented the position of the Catholic Church and of a vast majority of the overwhelmingly Catholic people of El Salvador. In a New York Times ad in February 1981, CISPES stated that "the Catholic Church (without reservation or qualification) has allied itself with the revolutionary left." But no significant segment of the Church in El Salvador supports the FDR. An FDR statement distributed in the United States and Europe claiming the Church's support was vigorously denied by the El Salvadoran bishops, who responded, "The fact that a small number of priests, nuns, and laymen in the so-called 'people's church' have followed a specific political option and have made a public commitment to the FDR is no reason to assume that this phenomenon is representative of the Salvadoran Catholic Church."

FDR literature often quotes Archbishop Rivera y Damas, whose views have been badly misrepresented in the United States by church spokesmen. Damas is the successor to Archbishop Oscar Romero, who was assassinated in 1980 and with whom Damas shared leadership of the most liberal faction of the Salvadoran Church.

Bishop Damas has been unequivocal in his denunciation of the Marxist guerillas. He has said that he "does not morally support the popular insurrection being carried out by leftist organizations" and that "the Salvadoran left has not been honest with the people" in that it is "inclined toward Communism."

American Church groups have far less contact with non-Communist, anti-government church leaders in El Salvador than they do with the FMLN/FDR. Figures like Bishop Damas are highlighted primarily for consumption in this country and Europe.

Clues to the actual participation of American missionaries in the insurgency have been provided by Julian Ignacio Otero Espinosa, a former member of the Finance Committee of the Popular Liberation Forces (Spanish acronym: FDL) who was recently captured by Salvadoran security forces. He has described the actions of Jesuit priests in purchasing arms for the FDL, the largest terrorist organization represented on the DRU. Jesuits also held a number of positions within the FDL and have been engaged in recruitment and the laundering of church funds through Guatemala for the guerrillas.

Priests and nuns of the Catholic Maryknoll order take active part in leading the opposition in El Salvador. The Maryknolls have long supported violent revolution in Central America. Maryknoll, the order's monthly magazine which has the second largest circulation of any Catholic publication in the country, has been openly supportive of the Nicaraguan and Salvadoran revolutions. From 1969-1979, its editor was Father Miguel D'Escoto, who left to participate in the Sandinista "final offensive" and subsequently became Nicaragua's Foreign Minister. The August 1980 issue of Maryknoll carried the theme "Religion in Cuba" which detailed the "progress" made under Fidel Castro. It neglected to point out that Christians who attempt to practice their faith on the island are put in jail.

As noted earlier, four of the five organizations that compromise the steering committee of CISPES are church-related or funded. They are:

Religious Task Force on El Salvador. An ad hoc committee of primarily Catholic leaders, including representatives of the Maryknolls, Jesuits, and the U.S. Catholic Conference. The Task Force joined CISPES in sponsoring a January 11, 1981 demonstration in Washington, D.C. An announcement in the Catholic Standard said the rally was endorsed by the Maryknolls, Catholic Peace Fellowship and the Justice Ministry of Sisters of St. Joseph of Peace.

Inter-Religious Task Force on El Salvador (not to be confused with the foregoing group), on record against U.S. aid since May 1980. Inter-Religious Task Force is a project of the National Council of Churchill (NCC) and occupies offices at NCC headquarters in New York.

NCC leaders such as President M. William Howard have been outspoken in their support of FMLN/FDR. A NCC news release of March 19, 1981 proclaimed "the majority of people in El Salvador have chosen to unite under the leadership of the FDR, recognizing it as the legitimate representative." The release announced a "massive letter campaign to local congregations to communicate opposition to U.S. aid."

The Ecumenical Program for Inter-American Communication and Action (EPICA) is a member of the CISPES steering committee. It describes itself as "an advisory group to the Commission on the Caribbean and Latin America of the National Council of Churches."

Its Director is Reverend Philip Wheaton, who accompanied guerilla leader Farid Handal during a portion of the 1980 tour which resulted in the founding of CISPES. Wheaton also is a contributing editor of CounterSpy.

During a Washington, D.C. news conference last April, Wheaton was asked to comment on remarks made a few days earlier by Salvadoran Archbishop Rivera y Damas condemning Cuba, Nicaragua, and the Soviet bloc for supplying arms to the guerillas. Wheaton responded by claiming these governments were not involved in supplying arms to the Salvadoran insurrection.

The North American Congress on Latin America (NACLA) is the last of the four church-supported groups among the five comprising the CISPES Steering Committee.

NACLA was founded in 1966 following U.S. military action in the Dominican Republic. It collects information on U.S. intelligence activities and private corporations in Latin America and the Caribbean. Its October 1967 newsletter is dedicated to Che Guevera. Carl Davidson, a former leader of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), credited NACLA with being "the intelligence gathering arm of the New Left." Philip Agee also cites the help of NACLA's research in his expose of the CIA.

The May/June issue of NACLA's Report on the Americas endorses the Sandinista toleration of free association by government opponents as a "transitional" state to end with the realization of a "full bloom socialist project" upon which these freedoms would cease to exist. Other leftist groups who receive either complete or partial church funding for their activities are as follows:

Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA). WOLA is a tax exempt organization "supported primarily by contributors from religious organizations, private foundations, and individuals." Its literature lists thirty-one religious groups who give financial assistance, including the Maryknolls, National Council of Churches, United States Catholic Conference, and United Methodist Church. Describing itself as a "non-governmental human rights organization," WOLA's Advisory Council includes Isabel Letelier, a Fellow of the left wing Institute for Policy Studies (IPS). She was the wife of the late Chilean diplomat Orlando Letelier, who was killed by a bomb blast in Washington in 1977. Documents taken from his briefcase later revealed him as a Cuban agent.

Clergy and Laity Concerned (CLC). An activist group founded to oppose the war in Vietnam. Don Luce, a prominent CLC leader and its National Director until 1978, was one of the leftists (like Jane Fonda) who refused to join Joan Baez in her condemnation of the Vietnamese government's treatment of the boat people in 1979.

CLC sponsored an open letter to President-elect Reagan in December 1980, signed by 71 religious leaders, charging that persons connected with the Reagan campaign had encouraged "many rightist figures" to believe that the Reagan Administration would "condone terror, torture and murder as the price of a favorable climate for U.S. investment."

CLC participated in an April 1981 conference on the Reagan Administration's Central American policy at Trinity College in Washington, D.C. Speakers included Representatives of the National Lawyers Guild (a Communist Party front group), the Nicaraguan embassy, and the FDR, who made a special "musical and personal" presentation. Other church groups participating were WOLA, the National Council of Churches, the National Office of Jesuit Social Ministries, and the American Friends Service Committee.

The Council on Hemispheric Affairs (COHA) is supported by church groups and a number of progressive labor unions.

COHA has conducted a drive in support of a "political solution" through negotiations between the FDR and the United States. It works closely with the Inter-Church Committee on Human Rights in Latin America, which is particularly active in Canada.

COHA's Board of Trustees includes Thomas Quigley, a staff member of the U.S. Catholic Conference and leader of the Religious Task Force on El Salvador, and Richard Barnet of the Institute for Policy Studies.

The Church, with its respectable tradition of missionary work and concern for the poor, has been shrewdly exploited by the FMLN/FDR to provide a cover for much of the pro-revolutionary activity in this country. But what we see is not misguided clergymen occupying the fringes of a protest movement dominated by the hard left, but the conscious involvement of church leaders in every level of a terrorist support apparatus.

This, unfortunately, has gone largely unnoticed by the American media, which have focused instead on the increasing political activism of the Christian right.

It would seem incumbent upon them to apply the same criteria of church-state separation to the religious left that they have so vigorously applied to their counter-parts on the right. This takes on greater significance when one considers that Christian conservatives have worked through democratic institutions while Christian leftists have supported armed insurrection and terror.

Though it remains to be seen if the media will assume their responsibility, there is hope within church circles that the activism of the left will be challenged through other channels. On April 28, 1981, a national campaign was launched by a new Washington-based organization to resist the efforts of those who are using religious organizations to build support for the revolutionaries in El Salvador. The Institute on Religion and Democracy announced its formation "to strengthen the link between Christian faith and democratic values," and is already distributing packets to U.S. Churches to counter the FDR propaganda spread by the National Council of Churches.

CISPES AND MOSCOW

The fifth group comprising the CISPES steering committee is the U.S. Peace Council. The U.S. Peace Council is affiliated with the World Peace Council whose budget is provided by the Soviet Union.

American liberals have long recognized the U.S. Peace Council as an instrument of Soviet foreign policy. As recently as 1980, it was denied membership to the leftist Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy because it was "consistently pro-Soviet."

At the 1979 founding conference of the U.S. Peace Council, Romesh Chandra, the President of the parent World Peace Council, defended armed revolution by stating, "People ask me, you are a peace movement. Why do you support armed struggles in Nicaragua, Palestine, Vietnam. And I reply [that] the armed struggle in these countries is the peace movement."

THE IPS CONNECTION

No discussion of American groups' support of revolution in El Salvador would be complete without acknowledging the role of the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS).

The importance of the IPS to Soviet disinformation and the assistance of worldwide revolutionary activity was recently popularized in the bestselling novel The Spike by Arnaud de Borchgrave and Robert Moss. IPS is headquartered in Washington, D.C. and maintains offices in Amsterdam and London for its Transnational Institute (TI). TI serves as a liaison to Marxist-Leninist countries and organizations around the world, including the Soviet Union, Cuba, and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). TI is headed by Tariq Ali, head of the International Marxist Group, the British unit of the Trotskyite Fourth International. His predecessor in the post was Orlando Letelier.

The IPS seeks to cloak its activities with respectability by involving liberal Congressmen, scholars, and other eminent policymakers in its programs. However, an examination of its regular publications and of the research produced by its fellows reveals it to be a hard left, pro-Soviet, totalitarian apologist.

Gareth Porter, an Indochina specialist long associated with IPS, wrote that Cambodia's genocidal maniac Pol Pot was "the latest victim of the enforcement of an ideology that social revolutions be portrayed as negatively as possible." Porter concluded that the Pol Pot regime, which murdered several million people, had created "a collective framework designed to release the creative energies of the people."

When Joan Baez, Daniel Ellsberg, and Philip and Daniel Berrigan spoke out against human rights violations by the Communists in Indochina, IPS founder Richard Barnet and 18 associates placed an advertisement in the January 30, 1977 New York Times reading, "The present government of Vietnam should be hailed for its moderation and efforts at reconciliation among all its people."

IPS was founded in 1963 by Barnet and Marcus Raskin who serve today as codirectors. The Institute is chaired by Peter Weiss, who also is President of the Samuel Rubin Foundation, IPS's largest financial supporter. During the Vietnam War these three made several trips to Hanoi where they praised North Vietnamese war efforts.

Weiss is the American who joined radical lawyer William Kunstler to petition a West German court for permission to represent the homicidal Baader-Meinhof terrorist gang. He is a prominent member of the Communist front National Lawyers Guild. Barnet and Raskin are involved with a number of leftist organizations concerned with El Salvador. Barnet is a board member of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs and Raskin is a former advisor to CounterSpy.

IPS's most successful activity through the years has been to spread disinformation in the United States and Europe. Its latest effort along these lines is its attempt to discredit the State Department White Paper on Soviet and Cuban support for Salvadoran revolutionaries.

The IPS newspaper In These Times has run recent articles calling the State Department documents fabrications. On March 17, the Los Angeles Times reprinted an article by John Dinges of the Pacific News Service which claimed the documents offer no proof of Soviet or Cuban aid to the guerillas. Dinges is an associate IPS fellow and the Pacific News Service has long been known as an IPS front group.

Other articles questioning the authenticity of the government documents—but quoting only an unnamed source—have found their way into major newspapers like the Wall Street Journal and Washington Post. However, Philip Agee has taken credit for creating the original controversy. In a Los Angeles Herald Examiner interview he said, "You may have seen news dispatches during February and as recently as a couple of weeks ago in the Wall Street Journal and Washington Post. All of this reporting was based on my analysis."

The reports proved a success. They were followed by a rash of newspaper commentaries making comparisons to LBJ's Gulf of Tonkin Resolution and citing questions raised by Agee's critique as if they were fact. Practically no media reported that the State Department had denied the charges and that the unnamed source later was discovered to be an FDR revolutionary and CounterSpy activist.

None of these efforts have been able to discredit the authenticity of the captured guerilla documents, on which the White Paper based its central thesis that the Salvadoran rebels are receiving Soviet-bloc arms. The questions have been technical in nature, concerning details like the exact type and number of weapons delivered to the guerillas. They do not add up to a credible challenge to the validity of the White Paper.

A number of other documents which have been captured from the guerillas are not part of the White Paper and have been released by the State Department only to news organizations. No spokesmen, including those of the far left, have challenged their authenticity.

In any event, Fidel Castro accidentally confirmed the contents of the White Paper in an interview with Hans-Jurgen Wischnewski of the West German Social Democratic Party in April. Wischnewski reported, "Castro did not deny that shipments of weapons took place and in that sense confirmed the White Paper."

CONCLUSION

The El Salvador protest movement must be represented as what it plainly is—an effort to stop U.S. aid to the present regime and promote a Communist takeover. It is ironic that FMLN/FDR is able to freely organize and seek material aid in the United States. Presumably, these same freedoms of association will not be extended to the people of El Salvador should the FDR take power.

Senator Jeremiah Denton (R.-Alabama), Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, recently wrote his colleagues warning of the influence of groups like IPS on the Congress. Although his subcommittee has no present plans to probe the IPS, there is speculation that an investigation may be imminent. It would also seem that an examination of CISPES and the rest of the terrorist support network would be appropriate.

In any event, what students and young people should ask when faced with anti-U.S. aid activity by groups like CISPES is—whose interests do they represent?

Mr. SYMMS. If the situation is desperate in El Salvador, Mr. President, it is not totally hopeless, providing we keep our nerve, and make the effort to understand what is going on there. Luckily, we do have at our service some clear-sighted officials of our foreign policy establishment. One of those is U.N. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick. In that same summer issue of New Guard, Ambassador Kirkpatrick's views were laid out in the text of a speech she had earlier delivered. I found Mrs. Kirkpatrick's analysis of El Salvador in particular and Latin America in general stimulating and accurate. I ask unanimous consent that her remarks be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIDING EL SALVADOR A "MORAL IMPERATIVE"

In thinking about policymaking for Central America and Latin America today there is a most urgent need to know what we are doing. There is very little margin for error. The margin of error that was available was used up by the last Administration and they used it to the hilt as we all know.

I would like to direct my remarks to what I take to be the principal prerequisite for a policy toward Latin America in general and specifically Central America, and even more specifically, toward El Salvador.

For the record, I have no particular responsibility for policymaking with regard to Central America or Latin America. I am not speaking of anything I've learned since I've been in this Administration, although I have learned a great deal. I am speaking off a background of interest and research accumulated several years in advance of entering the Administration.

There are four basic requisites to a reasonable and successful policy toward Latin America: we need to know what kind of policies we are dealing with; we need to know what kind of problems we are dealing with; we need to know what we are doing involving ourselves in those problems, or why we should care; and we need to understand why it is morally legitimate for us to be concerned with those problems and acting in relationship to them.

LATIN POLITIES

First, what kind of polities are we dealing with in Central America in general and El Salvador in particular? We are dealing with polities very different than our own. Those polities have some identifiable characteristics. What we see operating in El Salvador are weaknesses common to Latin politics. The most important of these weaknesses are chronic difficulties with legitimacy, authority and order. El Salvador, for its part, is a prototype, almost a caricature of a Central American republic. It is dominated by a relatively small, homogeneous social and economic aristocracy which has controlled a very large share of all the arable land, of the country's commerce, and a significant portion of its wealth.

That small oligarchy, as it is called, has had a very large portion of what was worth having in El Salvador for a very long time. That is one fact that we need to be clear about.

A second fact is that El Salvador's politics have been characterized by factionalism, schism, and low consensus. It has been said that political factions multiply like cells, by division. This is true for El Salvador and for Central American politics in general. It is also true for Latin American politics in general. The tendency of institutions to fall apart through schisms based on elite disagreements is very strong, and it has powerful implications for the polities.

The result of that tendecy of schism and factionalism is regime instability. Political science teachers talk about regime instability as not simply changes in the character of a particular administration, but changes in the character of the regime that holds the constitution. El Salvador has had 15 constitutions since it gained independence. That is perhaps the best indicator of its regime instability.

El Salvador's political tradition has been characterized by periodic coups. The last of these coups occurred in October of 1979. Those periodic coups are not only an indicator of the important role of the military in the government, and are not only an indicator of the low level of political stability. They are perhaps most important of all an indicator of the weaknesses of the successive governments which have governed El Salvador. And again, they are also characteristic of the weaknesses of the governments of the area.

Where governments are strong, there are not any military coups. Where there is a strong government, military coup attempts simply fail. The fact of military coups is the most dramatic possible proof of the inability of the government to control the military establishment. (By the way, there has never been a Communist government overthrown by a military coup.) Where government is strong military coups just don't occur.

The presence of military coups and the regular change of military governments by coups also symbolize the weakness of legitimacy in that system. It also symbolizes the ubiquity of violence because military competitors differ from all others by their monopoly on the use of the instruments of violence or threat of violence.

There are various ways in which governments come to power. We know the very best way is through peaceful competition and elections.

But there are other ways governments come to power. Monarchies bring governments to power by heredity and certain kinds of dictatorships bring governments to power by bureaucratic manipulation.

Where military coups are the regular mode of changing governments, however, we know that it is violence or the threat of violence that brings about the change of government. In Central America and in most of Latin America it is usually the threat of violence more than the actual violence that is used.

The fact that regimes change so rapidly means, among other things, that there is no opportunity for generalized loyalty toward the government to develop. Loyalty is an interesting and complicated psychological and social phenomenon. It is rooted in the fundamental values and patterns of child-rearing, early experiences and habits of people. It does not come into being normally by an act of will. Loyalty comes into being through a long process in which people come to internalize an identification with a particular set of processes, a particular set of institutions. Loyalty is not really fundamentally altered by people simply changing their minds after listening to a persuasive agrument. The development of loyalty takes time. Where regimes change rapidly there is little opportunity for the development of loyalty to a particular government. Under circumstances where regimes change rapidly, there is also no constitutional means for resolving the differences among the various claimants to power.

There are other characteristics of the polity which are important to mention in thinking about the area. In El Salvador, as in Central American polities generally as well as in Latin America more generally, the broad political culture tends to emphasize strength. Everybody knows about machismo and Latin culture. What machismo means for political systems is that the traits that are valued in the polity are not those which particularly simplify the process of establishing peaceful competition and institutionalizing any particular government.

The traits that are valued in the society tend to be traits like courage, honor, shrewdness, assertiveness, a certain capacity for risk, perhaps even a bit of recklessness and a certain manly disregard for safety.

All of these traits that one finds in the political culture tend also to reinforce the problem of order. It is a fact that polities like those we are dealing with in Central America are polities in which order is the central value. Order is the central value in any polity where order is in jeopardy.

This is not an idiosyncratic idea of mine. It is a notion that has been common in political philosophy throughout the whole history of political philosophy. Plato, for example, emphasized the centrality of order in his discussions of regimes in the Republic. Thomas Hobbes is the man who is famous for making the establishment of order, the maintenance of order, the central problem of politics. There is no characteristic more common in our culture that the underestimating of the importance of order, and the maintenance of order to a polity. The reason that we maintain it is that we are blessed by it—we are rarely confronted with major breaches of order.

Where there are weak governments, however, and low levels of legitimacy combined with high levels of regime instability and lack of institutionalized processes by which government can be changed, order becomes the central value of a polity.

This is very important to understand because it is relevant to the utility of terrorism, disruptions of order in the polities and problems of the area.

WHAT KIND OF PROBLEMS

This brings me to the second point I would like to make. What kind of problem are we dealing with in El Salvador and Central America generally. Many people would like us to believe the problem we are dealing with, in the short run, is a problem of social justice. Certainly it is the case that the people of El Salvador, and the area generally, have been and are ill-fed, ill-housed, ill-clothed and ill-nourished. They tend to be illiterate—literacy levels are very low. It is a bad scene. The distribution of wealth is such that there is a very small, wealthy class, which I mentioned earlier. There is a huge portion of the population that enjoys very few of the good things in life.

There are two things I would like to mention about this. One is that this has been the case in El Salvador and Central America throughout their history. As a social scientist I would like to point out that you cannot explain a short-range problem by reference to a permanent condition which has existed for centuries. If the existence of poverty, misery and illiteracy were the cause of the short-range problem which we confront and which El Salvador confronts today, then that problem would have been confronted with exactly the same level of intensity for the last 100 years. We know, of course, that is not the case.

The second point is that it is easy to establish that things have been getting better for the people of El Salvador and Central America in recent years. Infant mortality rates have dropped. Years in school have increased. Per capita income has increased. There is a growing, though relatively small, middle class. The commercial sector has been growing. The GNP is growing. Things have been getting better for the people of Central America and El Salvador. Now, if we saw here the pattern of revolutionary activity that Marx predicted and Lenin described, what we would see is the progressive pauperization of the people to the point where they would finally be ground down to such a miserable state of bare subsistence that they would have nothing to lose but their chains, which they would rise up against and throw off. And as we all know, revolutions do not happen that way in our time.

As Crane Breton demonstrated in his careful study of modern revolution, revolutions, in fact, take place not when things become worse and worse until they reach a point where people can no longer stand them. Revolutions take place at a time when things are getting better. They take place when regimes are less repressive, when people are less miserable and when there are rising expectations and changing views about government, society and economic distribution.

Revolutions, we know, are not caused by social injustice, although social injustice is not a good thing and I would like to be clear about that. Revolutions are caused by revolutionaries. Revolutionaries are people. They are not social forces. They are people with guns. Revolutions are caused by violence and terrorism. They are brought about by popular fronts. In Central America and El Salvador revolutionaries utilize the instruments of terror to destroy the already weak societies and institutions of government and undermine the already weak bases of order in that society.

Governments like that of El Salvador are especially vulnerable to terrorist subversion for three reasons. First, because they were not chosen by the people, none of them have any persuasive claim to having a popular mandate for their program.

Second, in a society where order is the central value, the inability of the government to maintain order becomes, in itself, a reason for abandoning the government. If a government cannot govern and there is no alternative claim to legitimacy then any claim to legitimacy is lost.

So, the weaker the government institution becomes and the more central the value of order becomes, the more vulnerable the entire government becomes if it is not able to maintain order.

That is exactly what terrorism does—it destroys the ordinary course of life in the society.

VULNERABILITY TO TERRORISM

There is a third reason such societies are particularly vulnerable to terrorism and why terrorism is a particularly useful instrument for revolution. Once order is under attack, force is required to restore it. But force, that is the force used by a government, itself further disrupts the order of society and feeds the impression that there is no significant difference between the government, which is using force to meet the challenges to order, and the terrorists who are using force to disrupt the order of society.

The special vulnerability of societies like those in El Salvador and Central America to terrorism has been discovered by Marxist-Leninist experts in revolution. It has been explained and discussed by them in a very straightforward way.

One of the definitive explications of the use of terror in such societies was made by Carlos Marighella (who was quoted recently in the new book by Claire Sterling, The Terror Network, which I recommended highly). Marighella, a theoretician of terrorism as an instrument of revolution, said, "the government has no alternative except to intensify repression. Police roundups, house searches, arrest of innocent people, makes life in the city unbearable once the urban guerrilla has launched his campaign. The general sentiment is that the government is unjust, incapable of solving problems and resorts purely and simply to the physician liquidation of its opponents. The political situation is transformed into a military situation, in which the government appears more and more responsible for errors and violence.

"Rejecting the so-called political solution, the urban guerrillas must become more aggressive and violent, resorting without letup to sabotage, terrorism, expropriations, assault, kidnapings and extortion; tightening thereby the disastrous situation by which the government must act." That is almost a literal description of the tactics being used in El Salvador by those "idealistic" revolutionaries and proponents of social justice who are challenging the government in that tormented country.

WHY AID EL SALVADOR

The third point regarding the prerequisite to a decent policy: we should know what we are doing there. If we are to take an active role in El Salvador and Central America, we should know what we are doing there. We should know why we should care about the region's problems.

The fact that there is human misery in El Salvador cannot be the definitive reason for caring. That may sound harsh. The fact is that human misery exists all over the world. If the desire to do good and help people to live better were our central reason for caring, there would be no more reason to be in El Salvador than, for example, to be in the Central African Republic or any of a large number of countries in the world.

There is another reason that it is inadequate. For our times, in our current weakened military condition, it is not enough to say we combat Communism anytime, anyplace in the world. The reason we should be in El Salvador and why we should be particularly concerned about Central American politics today is fundamentally a geopolitical concern. Our participation in El Salvador is a direct response to, and is justified by and made necessary by, the large military intervention by the Soviet-Cuban bloc. The revolutionaries we see acting in the area are revolutionaries who have been trained, armed, supported, advised in every sense and tied to the Soviet-Cuban bloc. That is what changes the character of these revolutions and revolutionaries from past ones. The only aim of this Administration is to help the government of El Salvador to deal with the Soviet-Cuban-sponsored military problem.

The real point about history and human beings is that you never get a fresh start from where you are. Where we are in El Salvador is where the Carter Administration left us—with Cuban and Soviet-backed insurgents. Military violence must be answered, in fact, with violence. First you put down the military rebellion. We don't put it down, but we provide the government of El Salvador with the minimum levels of ammunition and helicopters needed to offset the much greater concentration of instruments of violence that the guerrillas now possess.

By providing the government of El Salvador with enough help so they can put down the military challenge to the government—let's be clear, it is a military challenge, not a political challenge—then the country will be pacified. Then the Salvadorans themselves can decide what they want to do about their land reform, banks, and what they want to do about government themselves.

To add an autobiographical note here, two years ago during a month-long vacation outside of this country, I had some time to think. It was around the time the government of Nicaragua was in its last throes. I was thinking about that and looking at maps and it occurred to me that for the United States, for us, Central American and the Caribbean was, quite simply, the most important place in the world.

Why is Central America and the Caribbean the most important place in the world for us? The reason is geopolitical. It is a fact that in concerning ourselves with the spread of Marxism-Leninism in Central America and the Caribbean, we are quite literally concerning ourselves with the protection of our own security in a very direct immediate kind of way.

We are also concerning ourselves with our capacity to act in the rest of the world. We are defending ourselves and the rest of the world against the spread of hostile regimes.

Our capacity to play a major role in the politics and security of countries in remote places—and even Western Europe is remote compared to El Salvador—depends on our not having to devote the lion's share of our attention and resources to defending ourselves in our own Hemisphere.

The geopolitical stakes involved in the Caribbean and Central America can be compared to that point in a chess game where one move successfully completed changes the whole character of the game.

SOVIET SUBS OFFSHORE

It has not been commented upon very much and nobody likes to talk about the fact that with the nuclear submarine base in Cienfuegos, for example, we now have the reality, not just the possibility, of Soviet nuclear submarines not too far off our shores. With the development of bases and military installations in Cuba, we now have a variety of potential threats with assorted MiG fighters roaming the skies not too far off our shores, and who, from time to time, infringe upon the airspace over our nation.

Nobody likes to talk about the consolidation of power by a Marxist-Leninist regime in Nicaragua and the enormous, almost incredible military buildup that is underway there. This, quite apart from the weapons they are sending to El Salvador. The number of weapons being stockpiled and the military installations being developed are very substantial. Nobody likes to talk about it, but it's true.

Fidel Castro, last summer when he was in Managua for the first anniversary of the Sandinista victory, said, "Now there are three of us," meaning Cuba, Nicaragua and Grenada. He went on to suggest there would be 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 more. Not 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 "Vietnams," but 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 advanced Soviet bases in our Hemisphere, off our shores, threatening our national security in a very definitive way. That is why we must care. We must care for the most direct kind of security reasons.

A MORAL CONCERN

Finally, we must know why our concern for El Salvador, Central America and the Caribbean is a morally acceptable, legitimate undertaking. The answer to this is crucial yet very easy. History, we know, demonstrates with a clarity that is irresistible, that no matter how ill-fed, ill-clothed, no matter how illiterate or how miserable people have been under their traditional governments, they will be more miserable under Communist governments.

This does not mean that I support "moderately repressive regimes" in Central America or anyplace.

It does mean that morally responsible people recognize that there are degrees of evil. Nobody doubts that the government of Kaiser Wilhelm, although an autocracy, was less hard on the German people than the government of Adolph Hitler. No one in their right mind doubts that the government of Lon Nol was less murderous to the Cambodian people than the government of Pol Pot, or for that matter the government of Heng Samrin.

The fact is that Communism, Marxist-Leninist governments make things worse, not better. That fact we need to be very clear about. Communism, as we know, when it arrives at political power, does not produce an economic order that can support a population. It does not produce a social system that provides equal opportunity, or a good life for anyone. It simply does not work as a human system. Everybody understands that the number of refugees which pour out of Communist countries decade after decade after decade proves the inhumanity of the system and its incompatibility with human survival and human realizations.
